Group rallies for rights

Activists address detainees' situation

By Patrice R. Holderbach
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Bianca Luna, senior in microbiology and Spanish, stood among some fifty people looking for answers Sunday outside the Riley County Police Department.

Luna said she came to find out why, since Thursday morning, 15 detainees who had previously worked for El Cazador restaurant were being held without bond, access to attorneys or contact with family members.

"It was really, really shocking to see that they've taken so many people," Luna said. "My greatest concern was their families and their children."

The group, including detainees' families, students and social activists, was called together by Grace Hwang, board member of the Asian American Legal Defense and Education Fund.

Hwang said she called a "spontaneous" press conference that morning after someone who answered the phone at the RCPD told her "congratulations" for planning to bring attorneys and family members to the RCPD that afternoon.

Lance J. Luftman, assistant director of the RCPD, said Hwang had not arranged the conference through the RCPD. He told Hwang and the crowd he would allow anyone who showed up and was approved of by the detainees, to visit. This goes against RCPD protocol, he said, because ordinarily the detainees would be restricted to a written list of visitors.

The difference between an arrest and a detainment, Luftman said, is an arrest involves a criminal violation. A detainment means the individual is being held without charge. In this case, the RCPD is holding the detainees on behalf of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Luftman said.

Hwang, who is also the director of El Cazador employees detained by police

Outside the popular Mexican food restaurant, El Cazador, hangs a sign: El Cazador will be closed today.

Santiago Palomino, the manager of the Manhattan and Junction City locations, was arrested along with 15 of his employees for immigration violations, said Lt. Kurt Moldrup of the Riley County Police Department.

Moldrup said the arrests were the result of an ongoing investigation in cooperation with the Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the Kansas Bureau of Investigation.

"We initiated the investigation," he said. "It was an investigation into their activities."

However, Moldrup said RCPD didn't close El Cazador down.

"I cannot say why they closed,"

he said. "They probably don't have enough employees to be open."

Beginning at 6 a.m., search warrants were executed at 3004 Gary, 3003 Anderson, 922 Gardenway #3, 918 Gardenway #4, 910 Gardenway #4 and 2509 Stagg Hill #9, Moldrup said.

The ICE has all the employees in detainment and will take all but one of them into custody, said Marilu Cabrera, spokeswoman for ICE.

Palomino may face state charges for knowingly employing illegal immigrants depending on what the county attorney decides, Moldrup said. If state charges are pressed, the ICE will wait to take Palomino into custody.

Cabrera said ICE interviewed the employees on Friday.

No one at the El Cazador locations in Junction City and Manhattan was available for comment.

K-State unveils Webmail changes

By Stephanie Swoboda
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Webmail users received a big surprise on Monday when they logged on to check their KSU e-mail.

Members of the E-mail Enhancement Project of K-State switched the old familiar Powercat stamp into a sleeker, more polished looking page.

The change was made final Aug. 9.

Chuck Gould, computing and network service project manager, said they have been planning on the change since August 2003.

"With the new e-mail, we were looking at meeting most of the community's needs. The new Webmail offers more features with better interface, better spell check, and supports subfolders," Gould said.

The cost for such improvements are unknown to Gould, he said. The entire e-mail enhancement project received $200,000 from the vice provost, but the Webmail improvements used only a part of that money.

With changes come questions, and the Information Technology Assistance Center Help Desk is assigned to answer those calls.

Help Desk employees are hoping that the new system cuts down on the number of problems and questions that people have. Lester Stone, undecided

Stores, online sales offer many options for textbook purchases

By Annette Lawless
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The summer expenses are finally paid, and the first tuition payment is covered.

Yet one final expense is waiting to eat up student's pocketbooks - fall semester textbooks.

There are two steps to a satisfactory textbook shopping experience.

The first is getting a master list of course books.

"Both stores supply the only accurate booklist. Other places are not as up-to-date as we are. Professors come to us first," said Dan Walter, textbook manager of Varney's Bookstore and the K-State Student Union Bookstore.

After grabbing the booklist, the second step is selecting where to purchase the textbooks. There are several options for where to purchase class material.

Some students buy books from friends or roommates. Others go to bookstore such as Varney's. Some search for textbooks through the Internet.

Many students have turned to Web sites such as Amazon.com or Half.com for textbook purchasing resources.

Half.com is a subdivision of international marketplace eBay.

The site features a textbook superstore with a search engine to find textbooks by International Standard Book Number or by author, book title, or subject matter.

Students can purchase books through other online retailers with similar convenience.

Some K-State students have decided to challenge Web sites such as Half.com with a student-run Web site, KSUbooks.com.

Ross Wilson, junior in Computer Engineering, said he worked with two friends to develop the site this year.

"We wanted to help students by providing a free message board where students can sell textbooks or search for jobs," Wilson said.

"It's a place where students can communicate to each other. I sold a book today for half of what the bookstore sold it as. Without shipping costs, it is a better, cheaper deal."

Yet some students do not like the hassle of the Internet. And sometimes online suppliers cannot meet the demands of students.

Adrea Ree, senior in dietetics, said she supports shopping at local bookstores.

"I love Varney's. They have great service, and you don't have to worry about the hassle of shipping and handling," Ree said.

"You can trust them," she said.

WORLD IN REVIEW: 7 THINGS YOU DIDN'T KNOW 7 DAYS AGO

The duck gets his day

Staff and wire reports

Move over, Mickey

Disney's Donald Duck received the 2,257th star on the Hollywood Walk of Fame on Tuesday. In attendance at the event were actors in Donald Duck and Mickey Mouse costumes, as well as Michael Eisner, Disney chief executive.

Donald Duck made his cartoon debut in 1934's "The Wise Little Hen" and began starring in his own cartoons three years later.

SAVE THE LIVER

The world of culinary arts has lost a piece of its history.

Culinary personality Julia Child died last week at the age of 91, according to her publisher, Alfred Knopf. Child was known for her cookbooks, television shows and cooking schools.

Child had said that when she was younger she had wanted to be either a novelist or a basketball player (she was 6-foot-2).

WHICH SIDE ARE YOU ON?

The science-fiction film "Alien Vs. Predator" drew crowds to movie theaters over the weekend and debuted as the No. 1 opening film.

The movie, which had an estimated three-day gross of $38.25 million, pitted the title characters of the "Alien" and "Predator" films. It made $2 million more than last year's horror crossover movie, "Freddy Vs. Jason," which made $36.4 million during its opening weekend.

COMING OUT IN POLITICS

New Jersey state Sen. Joseph Kyrillos called for the immediate resignation of Gov. James McGreevey, who came out on national television and stated he would resign from his post in November.

McGreevey said at a press conference Thursday he is gay and had an extramarital affair with a man on his staff. Sources close to the man say he was a "victim" in the relationship.

KING OF POP TO APPEAR IN COURT

Sources close to Michael Jackson say the king of pop will come to court today to hear the charges of child molestation against him.

The hearing will be a family affair, with sisters Janet and LaToya and brother Jermaine expected to be in attendance.

CHARLEY CALMS DOWN

As of Sunday, 16 people were confirmed fatalities of Hurricane Charley as it continued to tear through Florida.

The hurricane's winds reached up to 180 miles per hour Friday as it made its way through Punta Gorda.

President Bush arrived in southwest Florida to inspect several sites that had been hit by Charley.

Upperclassmen offer different perspective on Rush Week

Sorority members decide to rush houses later in career to avoid overload of commitments

By Joanna Rubick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Old high school friends Sally Maddock and Jessica Silfverberg embraced when they discovered both would be pledging the same sorority, Kappa Alpha Theta.

"I was worried when I went to tell you, because I didn't know if you got it, but I had to tell you," Silfverberg said to Maddock on Bid Day Saturday.

Anxiety is a common feeling during Rush Week, but for Maddock and Silfverberg, that anxiety came with a twist.

They're upperclassmen at K-State.

Maddock and Silfverberg were two out of more than 20 sophomores and juniors who rushed, said Gabrianna Hall, Panhellenic recruitment coordinator.

With about 575 women in attendance, nearly 550 were asked to join a sorority, she said.

Hall said about 50 percent of the upperclassmen were asked to pledge.

"Overall it is hard for upperclassmen, because they are in the minority," she said.

Maddock, sophomore in architecture, found this to be true.

"It's a lot harder to get in if you're sophomores," she said.

Silfverberg, sophomore in music, said she didn't go through Rush before her freshman year because she didn't want to overload herself as a freshman.

"I didn't know a lot about K-State before I came here," she said. "I didn't know if I would have enough time."

Maddock said she had similar reasons as her friend, but ultimately her parents talked her out of attending last year.

Maddock and Silfverberg, along with all the other attendees, went through four rounds during Rush Week before finding out whether they were asked to join a sorority on Bid

Day.

First came an open house, where all the rushers go to the 11 sororities.

The service and leadership day came next, which allows the rushers to find out about the service and philanthropy projects the houses do.

The third round, sisterhoods, allows each house to perform certain skills.

Lastly, the privilege round allowed rushers to visit their top three choices.

With each round the girls visited fewer houses, Hall said.

This year Rush Week was somewhat different than previous years through use of a computer program, Inter-Collegiate Solutions, for the first time, she said.

"Everything was done on the computer versus filling everything out on bubble sheets," Hall said.

"Everything was processed with 30 seconds to a minute. It used to take a few hours."

Lia Frankovic, freshman in dietetics, hugs Courtney Hauser, freshman in psychology, after learning they had been selected for Gamma Phi Beta Sorority Saturday morning. Bid Day is the last event for Rush Week.

Drew Rose COLLEGIAN

The program allowed sororities to choose which women they would like to ask back, and if the women had more than the maximum number, they would choose which sororities they would like to visit again, she said.

Hall said the week went as smooth as could be expected.

"We had about 75 more girls than last year, so with the larger amount of girls everything went as well as it could," she said.

Maddock and Silfverberg said they found the week to be stressful.

"It was a lot of running around, and there was a lot of downtime, also," Maddock said.

"It's like the best and worst week of your life," Silfverberg said.

New York Times publisher to speak at 1st Landon Lecture of semester

Arthur Sulzberger Jr., publisher of The New York Times, will speak at 10:30 a.m. Monday, Sept. 13. Doors will open at 10:00 a.m., said Shelly Broccolo, events coordinator.

Sulzberger will be joined by his wife, Gail Gregg, a Topeka native who graduated from K-State in 1972 with a journalism degree.

During a telephone interview from his office in New York, Sulzberger said he had not finalized a topic, but alluded to a vignette about the history behind Manhattan's naming.

"I'm looking forward to it. After all, it's my wife's alma mater," Sulzberger said.

From her New York home, Gregg said she had been a Collegian reporter, columnist and co-managing editor before writing for The New York Times Magazine, Time, Boston Business and other publications, in addition to being an artist and freelance writer.

Now, she makes monthly trips to Topeka to visit family, she said.

Broccolo said this lecture is unusual because lecture coordinators don't often receive speaker confirmations until a few days before the delivery.

Sulzberger, however, had confirmed before the end of last spring, Broccolo said.

The lecture is free to the public.

TO THE POINT New challenges met with hope, renewed focus

The last time you read the Collegian, it was unsure of its future. We were involved in a cloud of criticism, a lawsuit and an examination of our policies.

As we begin a new semester, we are recommitting ourselves to quality journalism, strong news judgment and objectivity. We have new ideas and approaches to serve our readers better while creating a journalistically sound newspaper.

The Collegian still is dedicated to its readers. We strive to create a quality paper that represents the K-State community and issues of importance to you.

However, we need help. With as much news going on in our campus, city, state and world, the Collegian would benefit from the knowledge and experience of our readers.

We welcome your comments and ideas and even your criticism. You can contact us by calling (785) 532-6556 or e-mailing collegian@pub.ksu.edu.

While our staff strives to be your first and best resource for news and information, it cannot do so without creating and maintaining open and constructive dialogues with individuals and groups in and around our community.

The Collegian staff is eager and excited to embark on this new chapter in our history. We only ask you to read, reflect and respond.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

I, the writer of this column, in order to establish common sense, ensure decency, provide an equal understanding for all, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of college life, do ordain and establish these basic rights and no rights for all students across this campus.

JONAS HOGG

These rights are elementary in their nature, if anyone should have any questions concerning their rights, simply ask yourself this one simple question, "what would Jonas do?" This should clear up any misunderstandings you might have.

Firstly, concerning rights.

I. You have the right to speak your mind to anyone who wants to listen about whatever you care about.

II. You have the right to practice, preach, pray for, and worship any deity you so choose. There are many of them out there and none of them are planning to kidnap your children for sacrifice, despite what the critics may say. Ask some questions, go to some meetings and learn something.

III. You have the right to disagree with anyone you want to, about anything, at anytime.

IV. You have the right to go to class, work hard, study on the weekend and sacrifice a few parties — or not.

V. You have the right to devote yourself to many (not to be confused with any) causes. If you happen to think Karl Marx wrote the book of love, join or start a club. If you think Timothy McVeigh is great, you might want to keep that to yourself.

VI. You have the right to write a poem, perform in a play, sing a song, or watch a myriad of people doing any combination of these things. The whole world is not tuned in to Britney Spears.

VII. You have the right to try, and maybe fail, try again and maybe fail again, maybe quit, maybe not, grit your teeth, shrug your shoulders and do what you have to do. No one said this was going to be easy.

VIII. Any right not specifically mentioned here probably still is covered by the intergalactic rule of "common sense."

It's really not that difficult after all.

Second, we come to the issue of "no rights." Because many simply cannot discern where their rights end, I will help by spelling it out for you in black and white.

I. You have no right to be believed. If you can convince your audience using your own original ideas, then more power to you. Using the same argument that Michael Moore or Rush Limbaugh used last night likely will not have the favorable response you hoped for.

II. You have no right to my personal faith. Religion to me and many other people is a deeply private thing. If I ask you a question, please feel free to answer. However, if you interrupt me from my Taco Bell to inquire about my soul/faith/karma, expect a rude response.

III. You have no right to condemn anyone for any of his or her thoughts. We are a multi-faceted campus of multifaceted people with multifaceted opinions. Argue a different point, bring up a different perspective, but if your strongest arguing point happens to be "you're wrong," don't bother.

IV. You have no right to skip classes, shirk your responsibility, blow off your assignments and then expect a high grade at the end of the semester. Anyone who says, "I paid for the grade, not the class," within earshot of me should expect a karate chop.

V. You have no right to anyone's body but your own. I really hate having to say this to a group of adults, but should you choose to ignore this non-right, don't be surprised if many of us want to see you get the chair.

VI. Last and most important: you have no right to be here. This is a privilege and one that far too often is taken for granted.

There are many people, probably more deserving than you and I, who never will get the chance to attend a university. Value this experience, value the people who made it possible and work through it.

Far too many of us expect the "Animal House" lifestyle once we get here, completely ignorant of the fact we have one of the best opportunities on the planet in front of us. So if your entire reason for being here is Aggieville, kindly remove yourself from the roll and make room for someone who will make use of everything provided here.

Hints help freshmen survive semester

Jeremy Parker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Greetings fellow scholars, mustachioed professors and incoming freshmen, and welcome to another fun-tastic year at the mecca of knowledge we call Kansas State University.

Incoming freshman, there are a few things you will need to learn about surviving K-State, and I'm not talking about all that boring bull they tell you at orientation. I'm talking about real world advice that will get you through school without losing your marbles. I know these things, because I'm from the streets. Pay close attention.

1. Don't schedule any classes between 11 and 12. This is when TBS shows an hour block of "Saved By The Bell" on channel 29. But I'm sure you already knew that (and if you didn't, we can't be friends). Studies from the University of the Negev in Sde-Boker, Israel, have proven that watching an hour of the Bayside Bunch before class triples your brainpower. It's kind of like the Mozart effect, only this one is true. You can't argue, because it's in a study.

2. People will try to give you boatloads of free stuff on the first day. Use some restraint, because credit card companies are jerks.

Although it may seem tempting and irresistible at the time, the lure of a free John Belushi "College" T-shirt will not seem worth it when you are swimming in colossal debt seven years from now. In the long-term, restraint will save you money, which is good. You'll need that extra cash to buy your one-way ticket to Dingleberry-ville.

3. Just because you're an incoming freshman and you're a sucker for the tennis skirt explosion doesn't mean you have to snatch up a girlfriend the second you step on campus. Don't rush things. You've got plenty of time to invest yourself in an ill-advised relationship.

4. Don't get pregnant. The best thing about K-State (besides Darren Sproles) is that a month's worth of birth control pills are available at the student health center for a measly $8.50 a month. You can't afford to miss these incredible savings. Although I have never been pregnant, I hear it makes your feet swell. And nobody wants that.

5. If you're using someone else's ID to sneak into bars, it is wise to memorize everything on there. Leave no stone unturned. Just when you think you've got it all down, a skeptical bouncer might ask you "your" sign. Stammering through a hesitant "...Capricorn?" is kind of a giveaway.

Also, avoid the college-aged bouncer at the bar with the dark hair and goatee. He is like a hawk — a hawk who will make you rue the day. You'll know him by his homemade "College" T-shirt that he sports every freaking night. As you can tell, he's a totally sweet dude.

6. Roommates hate it when you wake them up by blaring Styx's "Mr. Roboto." Unfortunately for them, it is hilarious, so try to do it at least six times a week.

7. If your roommate leaves a cooked/stinky Bowl Appetit in your microwave for a week, the only logical solution is to drop it down six flights of stairs in your dorm. When it hits the bottom, you will realize that you have just created a monster. A suffocating, fetid, unfathomably heinous monster.

A stench you can't even begin to comprehend will overtake the entire stairwell, yielding hilarious results when you and your friends try to race and see who can climb the most flights without vomiting. If you make it all the way from the first floor to the sixth, congratulations: you are crowned Iron Man.

8. Thanks to a former mayor and his four goons, it is now illegal in Manhattan to have an erection in public, even if it's concealed and invisible. If you are found with an erection in public, you will probably be arrested and thrown into the town dungeon, forced to live off of a steady diet of grub worms and finger nail clippings. Thanks, Manhattan City Commission.

And thank you, readers. I hope everything goes well for you this semester. Take your vitamins, wash behind your ears and don't let the bedbugs bite.

Union Food Court undergoes vendor changes

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manchu Wok no longer has a place in the K-State Student Union Food Court.

In its place is Origins, which will serve a different type of ethnic food each week.

Tina Griffin, senior food service director for the Union Food Court, said the change was based on student requests.

"Last year we did student surveys, and there were several students who wanted a fresher variety of ethnic food," she said.

"We're going to have a really authentic type of ethnic food – not the fast-food type."

Origins is not the only new concept in the Union Food Court.

Griffin said Mean Gene's Burgers has replaced the registers with sandwich chutes so students can grab their food and go.

"One of the complaints we had was that students had to wait too long here," she said. "This should change that."

There will also be a new baked potato bar that will be located where the Greek cuisine once was.

"We're not eliminating the Greek cuisine," she said. "It will be served in the Origins location as one of the weekly ethnic cuisines."

Jack Connaughton, associate director of the Union, said the Union Food Court is not the only place in the Union that has undergone changes.

"We try to go throughout the entire building in some shape, manner or form," he said.

New carpet that glows in a black light has been added to the Union Recreation Center.

Terri Eddy, Union recreation manager, said this is just one of the changes that will help enhance Rock Bowl.

"We are also getting glowing shoelaces, which we will change out as the old ones get worn down," she said.

The arcade area also will have a new look.

"In the arcade, the plan is to have only blacklights – no fluorescents," she said.

Acting news adviser named

Columnist for local newspaper takes Collegian adviser helm for upcoming school year

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Pete Goering has been named the Collegian interim adviser until June.

Goering was chosen by a search committee that consisted of the full-time Student Publications staff and student editors.

Six applications were received for the position – two withdrew.

Linda Puntney, acting director of Student Publications, said Goering was chosen for a number of reasons.

"He has great professional experience, respects the First Amendment and really just wants to be an adviser," she said.

Puntney said she also appreciated the fact that he is a K-State alumnus, worked on the Collegian and was an adjunct professor for the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications last year.

After graduating with a degree in journalism from K-State in 1970, Goering worked for two years in public relations for the Menninger Foundation in Topeka.

In 1973, Goering began working at The Topeka Capital-Journal, where he currently works as a local columnist.

Goering has served in many positions during his years at the Capital-Journal, including sports editor, sports columnist, managing editor and executive editor.

Goering said his time as an adjunct professor at K-State last year is why he decided to apply for the position.

"Being around the college students again last year was invigorating," he said.

"It was nice to see the passion that college students bring."

Goering said he also wanted to help the Collegian staff during their time of transition after their former adviser, Ron Johnson, was reassigned.

"It was kind of a challenging time for the Collegian, and I thought I could help," he said.

"I want to do anything I can to try to help everyone get through a difficult period."

Puntney said with Goering's busy schedule, he is taking on a lot as the interim adviser.

"Taking this on is definitely a labor of love," she said.

Goering said although he is busy, his goal is to assist the Collegian staff in any way he can.

While his specialty areas are writing and reporting, Goering said he still has ideas when it comes to design.

"I know what good design is and I've worked around good designers, and I've learned from them," he said.

Puntney said she agrees.

"Because it's short term, what we need is what he can bring to us – a professional focus on coverage and writing," she said.

Expect athletic greatness this year

JOSH WITT

Uncharted waters. That's exactly what K-State athletics is sailing into, as we enter the 2004-2005 school year.

Not that this is a bad thing. Last year we saw the Wildcats capture three Big 12 titles in "top tier" sports thanks to the efforts of the volleyball squad, women's basketball team and Coach Snyder and company.

Try to guess the last time that happened in Big 12 history.

Never.

Those conference titles were a nice "how do you like us now?" to those around the Big 12 — and even the nation — that this little university in the middle of nowhere could stack up to any Division-I school out there.

The individual honors K-State athletes received last year were just as impressive.

Ten Wildcats were named first-team All-American, including this guy — oh, what's his name? Darren something? — and three Big 12 Conference players of the year.

In fact, look at every K-State sport last year — men's golf to equestrian, rowing to track and field — and find one that took a significant step backward.

You won't.

Every sport did something special last year, and that's not some cheesy line from a Wildcat "Homer," it's the flat-out truth.

But here's the thing — where do we go from here?

How can K-State top last year? Is it possible?

It's definitely possible, and it starts this fall. The defending Big 12 Champion football and volleyball teams could very well repeat this year.

There are doubters. They say the losses are too significant. They say losing Eli Roberson, Josh Buhl and Nick Leckey on the field and Lauren Goehring on the court is too much.

They better watch out.

Coach Suzie Fritz will be minus first-team All-American Goehring, but the Wildcats return several key players including three dynamic seniors in Lisa Martin, Big 12 Newcomer of the Year Vali Heijas and pre-season All-Big 12 pick Gabby Guerre.

The No. 14 Wildcats open up play Sept. 1 against Oral Roberts at Ahearn Field House.

As for the gridiron, you don't have to be that "Jeopardy" guy to realize the Wildcats will be a fun team to watch this year.

There are questions at quarterback, but there's that one guy — ah, I remember now, Darren Sproles — who has the best chance of any Wildcat ever to win the Heisman Trophy.

That party begins Sept. 4 against Western Kentucky at KSU Stadium.

As for the other members of the K-State athletic family, don't sleep on them either.

Watch for names like Chesang and Culbertson in cross country, Kern in men's golf, Heffel in women's golf and Rosenberg in women's tennis.

Also keep an eye out for the continued success of the equestrian team under new coach Teresa Slough and the job Patrick Sweeney is doing with the rowers.

Right now you might be asking, "Who?", but you'll witness athletic excellence in progress if you pay attention.

Ladies and gentlemen, welcome back to "The Kansas State University" and freshmen, glad you're here.

This year should be good times.

Senior misses cut, shares enthusiasm for golf with dad

By Angie Hanson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Senior Sarah Heffel was anything but pleased with her performance Aug. 9-15 at the U.S. Women's Amateur golf tournament at Kawahaka Golf Club in Erie, Pa.

Heffel competed in the qualifying rounds on Aug. 9-10 but missed the cut to participate in match play.

"I didn't play very well at all," Heffel said.

This was not the case when Heffel qualified for the national event at the Arizona Amateur earlier this summer. By shooting a 73, Heffel beat 31 other players to be one of five participants to proceed to the U.S. Women's Amateur.

Heffel's father, Spencer Heffel, caddied for his daughter at the Arizona Amateur, as well as last week's Amateur.

Heffel said having her father as a caddie alleviates some of the pressure of competing at a high level.

"It helps me to relax because it's someone you know," she said.

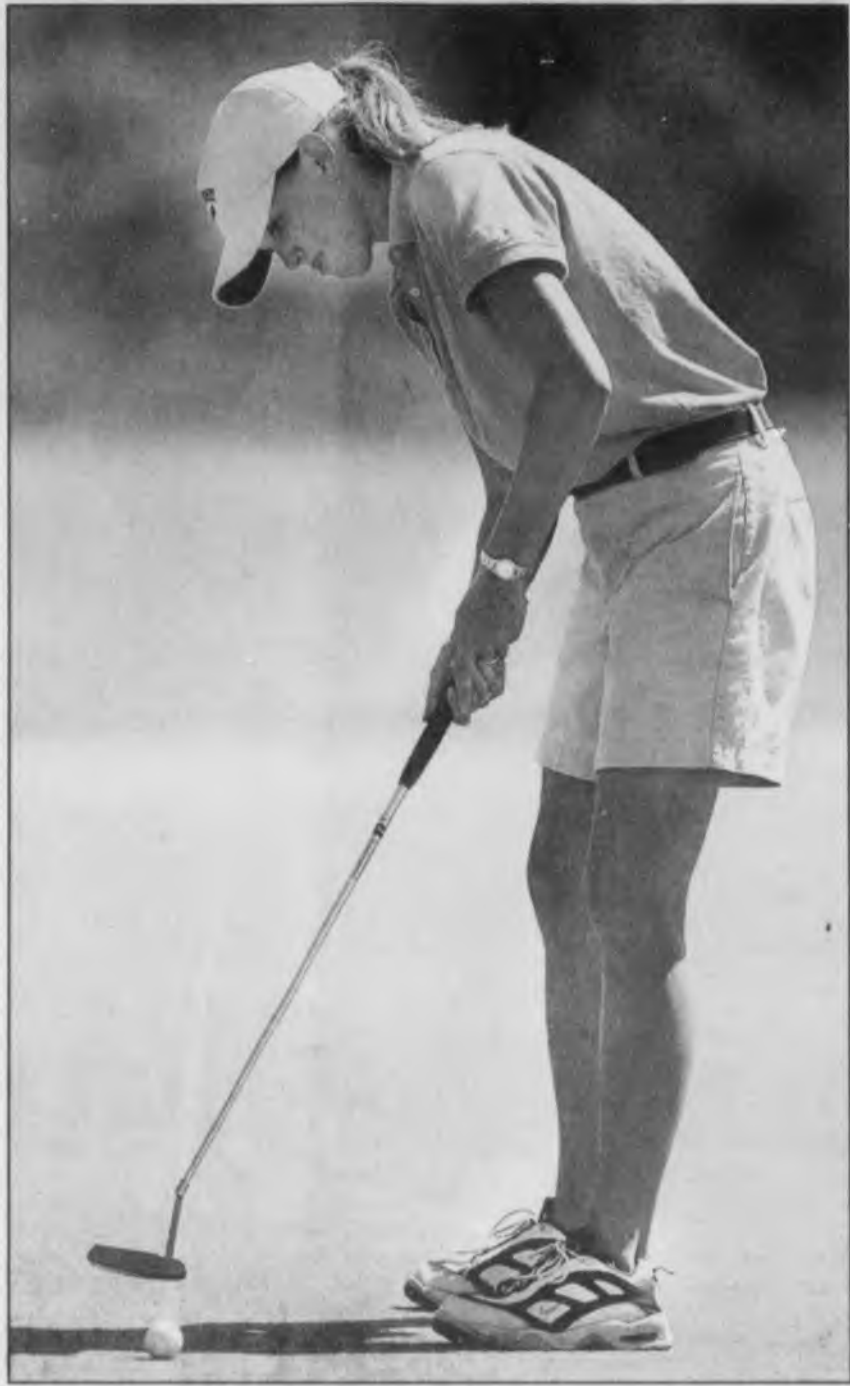

"He helps me to feel comfortable."

Spencer Heffel said he shares the same sentiment and enjoys watching his daughter compete.

"I love watching her think about and make decisions about her shot. Sarah doesn't need advice anymore. I'm just there to carry the bag," he said.

However, her father's calming influence was not enough to secure a spot in match play last week.

Kahkwa Golf Club is known for its heavily wooded course, and the numerous trees present a challenge for those who veer off the fairway.

Senior golfer Sarah Heffel competed in the U.S. Women's Amateur golf tournament held in Erie, Pa. on Aug. 9-15. Heffel competed in the qualifying rounds held on Aug. 9th and 10th, but missed the cut to participate in match play.

According to her father, a lack of accuracy off the tee was Heffel's greatest enemy.

"Sarah's biggest problem was she didn't hit enough fairways," he said.

Despite a poor showing at the U.S. Women's Amateur, Heffel said she realizes it is a privilege to compete against the top players in the country in a tournament of such high caliber.

"It gave me a lot of confidence just to qualify," Heffel said.

K-State women's golf coach Kristi Knight said she agreed a rise in confidence would be crucial to Heffel's success this season.

"Sarah's game has really developed. She is solid in each area, except for her confidence. Hopefully, this experience (the U.S. Women's Amateur) will be a confidence boost," Knight said.

With the week behind her, Heffel now can use the experience to her benefit and focus on her senior season. Including Heffel, five players return for the Wildcats this season. Last year, the squad ended the season ranked 42nd in the country, but placed just ninth in the Big 12. Heffel said she remains optimistic.

"We should be very competitive this year. We've worked really hard on our games, and we have a lot of faith in the freshman," she said. "And we have a couple of things to prove."

Elgert begins tournament play today

By Angie Hanson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Former Wildcat A.J. Elgert, member of the 2003-04 K-State men's golf team, begins competition today in the U.S. Men's Amateur tournament at Winged Foot Golf Course in Mamaronck, N.Y.

The tournament runs Aug. 16-22, with the opening two days consisting of qualifying rounds in which 322 golfers compete for 64 match-play positions.

By winning the Nebraska Amateur Championship in July, Elgert — a Lincoln, Neb.-native — qualified for the U.S. Amateur.

With his history of success at K-State, including being named to the PING Division-I All-America third team this summer, there is reason to believe Elgert will do well at the U.S. Amateur.

"K-State definitely helped my chances of getting me where I am today," Elgert said.

Men's golf coach Tim Norris said he believes Elgert is capable of a great performance at the U.S. Amateur.

"A.J. was always a player who played well on the tough courses," he said.

"Getting to the quarterfinals is very realistic for him."

Junior Ben Kern said he sees his former teammate's skills as flawless.

"A.J.'s an all around amazing player. There are no weaknesses in his game," Kern said.

If Elgert's legacy of success continues into the U.S. Amateur, his dream of playing professional golf could become a reality.

"I prepare to win. This is the highest level you can play without being in the pros. If you play well here, you can make it to the pros," Elgert said.

Elgert said he believes focusing on his short game — primarily putting and chipping — will be the key to success, while Norris said Elgert's ability to drive the ball long and straight is his greatest strength.

A.J. Elgert, a former member of the K-State men's golf team, shown here at the NCAA Men's Central Regional Golf Championships in May, will compete in the U.S. Men's Amateur tournament.

One word describes the women's rowing team this year — young.

With only three varsity members returning from last year's team, this will be the second year of rebuilding for the Wildcats with second-year head coach Patrick Sweeney.

Sweeney said this year is a rollover from the previous season.

"The team is young. Last year was a changing over and this year is just going to be the second year of that changing over," Sweeney said. "Only three girls are returning, but there are a lot of sophomores coming back."

Seniors Linzi Hauldren and Grace Riekenberg and junior Megan Hauver are the team's returning competitors from the varsity level.

All three were letter winners last season and are expected to contribute to the team's strengths this year.

Hauldren said unity and rebuilding are going to be important.

"The team this year is going to be very young and it will be a building year from last year, but it will be a good one," she said.

Check it out fall rowing schedule

■ Sat., Sept. 25 Head of the Des Moines at Des Moines, Iowa

■ Sun., Oct. 31 Head of the Iowa at Iowa City, Iowa

■ Sat., Nov. 13 Sunflower Showdown at Lawrence, Kan.

Even though this season will still be a phase of transition for the Wildcats, returning rowers said they are looking forward to leading by example and coming together to work as a team.

"The three of us will assume the leadership roles, but it will be more of a team effort in everything we do," Hauldren said.

The Wildcats have many returning sophomores, so this season will be their first competing on the varsity squad.

"This is the hardest transition to make," Hauldren said. "Coming into varsity from novice you have different coaches and teammates, and you have to adjust to that."

Though youth is a theme for this season's team, Sweeney said he is excited with the program's direction.

"There are a lot of good girls coming through. They just aren't that experienced," he said.

Olympics | U.S. basketball team loses to Puerto Rico

ATHENS, Greece — In an upset as historic as it was inevitable, Tim Duncan, Allen Iverson and the rest of the U.S. basketball team lost 92-73 to Puerto Rico on Sunday, only the third Olympic defeat ever for the Americans.

It was also the most lopsided loss in the games for the U.S. team, alarming not only for its significance but also for its decisiveness.

Puerto Rico, which had lost to the Americans five times in the past 13 months, took control in the first half, led by 22 at halftime and gamely held off a fourth-quarter comeback for one of the biggest sports achievements in the island territory's history.

The loss was a blow to the Americans' confidence, but it did little to hurt their gold medal chances. They need only to finish in the top four of their six-team group to reach the quarterfinals.

Still, the defeat will go a long way toward giving the competition the bold idea that it's someone else's turn to move to the top of a sport that's been dominated by one country for nearly three-quarters of a century.

Olympics | Phelps, U.S. settle for bronze in relay

ATHENS, Greece — The best Michael Phelps can do is win seven gold medals at these Olympics.

Phelps got a spot on the American relay team at the expense of eight-time medalist Gary Hall Jr., but the team had to settle for bronze when South Africa set a world-record that left the U.S. foursome standing glumly on the deck Sunday night.

With six events left in Athens, the best Phelps can do is tie Mark Spitz's record. He opened with a gold in the 400 individual medley Saturday, but needed gold in all eight finals to surpass Spitz's haul from the 1972 Munich Games.

panded, remodeled, or come under new ownership.

Sieben said Aggieville has reached its capacity in terms of store fronts.

"It is 99 percent leased and occupied," she said.

In the coming month, Sieben said, there should be more dining options in Aggieville.

"From what I'm hearing," Sieben said, "three new dining facilities are coming. There'll be more choices for that."

Restaurants aren't the only new attractions coming to Aggieville.

"There'll be more apartments for living in and around Aggieville," Sieben said.

Karen Davis, director of community development for the City of Manhattan, said there are numerous housing and apartment complexes in the works or under construction, including Founder's Hill, a mainly student development, that is located at the intersection of College Avenue and Claflin Road.

There also are new businesses on the way in other parts of town.

Davis said the former Wal-Mart building is going to be occupied by Hobby Lobby and Hastings Book, Music, and Video; there will also be a Famous Dave's BBQ and a second Arby's location near Target on Southwind Place.

Some new restaurants already have opened as well.

Jason Hilgers, assistant city manager for the City of Manhattan, said Panera Bread recently opened its first Manhattan location in the Southwind area as well.

But development in Manhattan isn't only commercial.

"The attractions committee has developed a downtown redevelopment recommendation that could receive Star bond financing from the State of Kansas," Hilgers said.

"The attractions committee will give its recommendation to the City Commission on Aug. 31."

Hilgers said the attractions committee has recommended a Prairie Discovery Center, which would include tall prairie grass exhibits and nature based tourism.

"There would also be a visitor center, an outdoor plaza, and a rather large meeting room that could be used as a conference room or for weddings and reunions," Hilgers said.

He said the proposed center could cost $20 million, with the accompanying projects possibly costing $160 to $170 million.

Roadwork under way for city

By Joanna Rubick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Road construction has popped up around Manhattan this summer and made for a change in traffic flow for returning students. Many of the projects have been completed, such as revamping the intersection of Bluemont Avenue and Tuttle Creek Boulevard near the Wal-Mart Supercenter; however, the project at the corner of Tuttle Creek and Ehlers Road is still under way, said Chuck Williams, public works director.

After less than one year as a one-way street, 12th Street between Bluemont and Moro Street is back to a two-way street once again, though things aren't quite the way they were prior to the switch. When turning onto Bluemont from 12th Street, only right turns are allowed. "The reason we made it one way was to try to make it safer," Williams said. "We feel the intersection is still safe by prohibiting left turns onto Bluemont."

Also, students may be experiencing road work where they live because of the annual street overlay. Jeff Hancock, City of Manhattan engineer, said the overlays take place mainly in residential areas and will last until the end of September. Williams said there is no road construction planned for the near future, but there are plans to work on Denison Avenue between Anderson Avenue and Kimball Street. Road construction there should begin next summer.

Florida cleans up in wake of Hurricane Charley

By Allen G. Breed
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PUNTA GORDA, Fla. — Residents left homeless by Hurricane Charley's 145 mph winds dug through their ravaged homes Sunday, sweeping up shattered glass and rescuing what they could as President Bush promised rapid delivery of disaster aid. With temperatures in the 90s and humidity that made it feel hotter, people waited with carts in long lines to buy ice. Supermarkets gave away water in five cities as more than 1 million people remained without power and 2,400 stayed in emergency shelters.

"It's as close to hell as I can think of," said Khoun Khamphapa, a resident of Easy Street in Port Charlotte, as he looked around his neighborhood of gutted homes. "It's just breathtaking."

The president surveyed the devastation in Florida, where the storm caused billions of dollars in damage and killed at least 16 people, as Charley weakened off the coast of New England.

In and around Punta Gorda, trailer after trailer lay on their sides. Others were blown apart entirely, exposing interior walls that had been pushed down flat, with doorways leading to nowhere. Other rooms stood, but without ceilings or roofs to shelter them from the open sky.

Shards of wood and metal lay scattered about the green yards and floated in blue swimming pools that were filled to the brim by rainwater.

Chad Maxwell shoveled up soggy ceiling tiles and shattered glass Sunday from the floor of the real estate office where he works in Punta Gorda. Downtown "looks like a bomb zone," he said, surveying the coffee shop next door, which lost its second floor, and a florist with only one wall standing.

"Everything's gone. Everything's tore up," he said.

Emergency officials pronounced Charley the worst hurricane to hit Florida since Hurricane Andrew in 1992. Twenty-six deaths were directly linked to Andrew, which caused $19.9 billion in insured property losses.

The hardest-hit areas appeared to be the retirement community of Punta Gorda and Port Charlotte in Charlotte County, though federal officials expanded the disaster aid zone to 25 counties on Sunday.

From his helicopter Marine One, President Bush could see debris from trailer park homes strewn across green fields and roofs that had been torn off hangars at Charlotte County Airport before consoling storm victims in Punta Gorda.

"All the clothes that I've got now is just what I'm wearing," resident George Nickols told Bush during the president's 2 1/2-hour visit.

The president promised rapid assistance for Florida, where officials estimated damages of up to $11 billion to insured homes alone.

When asked about why he made such a quick trip to Florida in this election year, Bush said: "If I didn't come, they would've said we should have been here more rapidly."

The Federal Emergency Management Agency was sending teams of medical, urban rescue and communication workers; at least 60 semi-trailers containing cots, blankets, meals, portable toilets, wash kits and other necessities; and truckloads of water and ice to be deployed in the affected areas. FEMA said the state has requested catastrophic housing for 10,000 people.

Campus Edge project in works for Aggieville

By Joanna Rubick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The gateway to campus and Aggieville could be undergoing a makeover, but so far those plans are conceptual at best.

Local business owners and university professors have met with architect Brent Bowman to create a master plan for the Aggieville Campus Edge project.

"We feel there's been a long time since anything has been done in the Aggieville area," said Jeff Levin, co-owner of Varney's Book Store.

The area would be bordered by Bluemont Street on the south, Manhattan Avenue on the west, 11th Street on the east and Bertrand Street on the north. There would also be changes made to the existing Aggieville area, he said.

These changes include housing, retail and parking garages, Levin said.

"I'm convinced it's a clear deal that parking garages will benefit everyone," he said.

Levin said they would like to give the area a more "traditional urban look" similar to Moro Street, as opposed to a "sprawling suburbanized look."

Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association, said she thinks this will work well with other happening in Manhattan such as the Downtown Redevelopment project.

"I think it would be a plus anytime you can do a project along with the others," she said. "It's all good for the whole community."

Sieben said the parking garages would be a welcome addition for everyone, because they can be useful for both Aggieville and K-State.

"Parking always seems to be one of the things we hear we don't have enough of," she said. "Anytime you can add more is good."

Mayor Brad Everett said the City of Manhattan funded $5,000 to employ an architect. Thus far, however, there have been only private meetings on the subject.

"It's just conceptual. The plan is in its infancy," Everett said. "It needs to find some partners, find some legs to stand on."

Levin said possible funding could come from a Transportation Development District, which would slightly raise the sales tax in Aggieville and surrounding areas.

He said there will be two public meetings on the matter—one from 3 to 5 p.m. on Aug. 19 and another from 9 to 10:30 a.m. on Aug. 20. The public can comment and give ideas.

Pope delivers Sunday Mass at French shrine

By Angela Doland
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOURDES, France - A sick man among the sick, Pope John Paul II struggled through Sunday Mass at a French shrine that draws desperate people seeking miracle cures. The 84-year-old pontiff gasped, trembled and asked aides for help during the 2 1/2 hour service in sizzling heat.

More than 300,000 pilgrims packed a field overlooking the Lourdes grotto in the southwestern Pyrenees, where an illiterate peasant girl, St. Bernadette, said she had visions of a white-clad Virgin Mary in 1858.

Many pilgrims to Lourdes are sick, handicapped or aged. In blue wheelchairs lined up on the grass, they watched as the frail pope spoke from his wheeled throne, which was perched on a red-carpeted stage and shaded by a white tent.

The pontiff—who suffers from Parkinson's disease and crippling hip and knee problems—greeted the sick with "special affection."

The pope delivered his opening prayers clearly and with strength, but the homily in French left him trembling and gasping for air. At one point he paused to say, "Help me," in his native Polish.

Aides brought John Paul a glass of water, and he said he wanted to continue. Though he skipped several paragraphs, he was able to deliver a final, forceful point: a condemnation of abortion, cloning and euthanasia.

"I appeal urgently to all of you, dear brothers and sisters, to do everything in your power to ensure that life, each and every life, will be respected from conception to its natural end," he said. The pope also spoke out against materialism and secularism.

The pope also spoke out against materialism and secularism. He singled out women, asking them to be witnesses "of those essential values which are seen only with the eyes of the heart." The message was in line with a recent Vatican document accusing feminism of blurring the distinctions between men and women.

John Paul drew cheers for his appeals—and for simply making it through his sentences. Each time he paused, applause of encouragement burst from the crowd.

"Whenever he says something with a lot of meaning, he seems to gain energy," said Vincent Barresi, a 55-year-old Frenchman who watched from a wheelchair. "Given his health, this is a sacrifice for him. He has a rare kind of courage."

Recall vote begins in Venezuela

Millions turn out for referendum on President Chavez

By Christopher Toothaker
ASSOCIATED PRESS

CARACAS, Venezuela - Summoned by bugle calls and firecrackers, millions of Venezuelans turned out in unprecedented numbers Sunday to vote on whether to force leftist President Hugo Chavez from office.

Lines snaked for blocks in upscale neighborhoods, where suspicion is high that the leftist leader plans a Cuba-style dictatorship, and in the slums, where support for his "revolution for the poor" is fervent. A seven-hour wait to vote was common.

The first-ever recall referendum for a president in Venezuela's history was aimed at putting a lid on years of often violent political unrest and came after a lengthy and complicated process of mass signings of petitions.

Election officials decided to keep polls open at least four hours longer than scheduled and assured voters that polling stations would be kept open until everyone in line cast their ballots.

Exit polls were banned. Results were not expected until several hours after polls close.

"This is the largest turnout I have ever seen," said former President Jimmy Carter, who monitored the vote. "There are thousands of people in line, waiting patiently and without any disturbance."

Venezuelans tend to love or hate Chavez, a 50-year-old former paratroop commander, with sentiment drawn along class lines.

Activists from both sides urged voters to the polls, but they needed little pushing.

Lula Golding, a 54-year-old Chavez opponent, awoke to ear-splitting fireworks in Caracas' trendy Chacao district at 3 a.m., then voted when polls opened three hours later.

"The hate that the president has sown among Venezuelans is unacceptable," said Golding, who accused Chavez of dividing the impoverished nation of 25 million people along class lines.

Across the capital in the La Pastora slum of brick shanties, thousands of Chavez supporters rose before dawn to "reveille" bugle calls from loudspeakers. Hours later, many were still calmly waiting to vote under a radiant Caribbean sun.

Miguel Rodriguez, a 41-year-old bus driver, helped the get-out-the-vote effort by transporting Chavez supporters to voting centers.

"Chavez is working hard to improve life for the impoverished, giving them opportunities that past governments never even considered," Rodriguez said.

Chavez has directed spending from government coffers, beefed up by huge oil revenues, to pay for literacy programs, scholarships and free medical care for Venezuela's majority poor.

Thousands of Cuban doctors, dentists and nurses, sent by Chavez's friend Cuban President Fidel Castro, work in poor barrios across this South American nation.

He has often lashed out at the rich, even referring to them as "devils," and he has alienated the United States with his criticism of Washington's economic and foreign policies.

At a polling station in the wealthy Palos Grandes district, one man urged voters who were waiting in line for hours to be patient, eliciting a burst of applause.

"Don't despair," shouted Pablo Ramirez. "You may be tired of waiting, but they are going to be tired of counting all your votes. We got as far as forcing the referendum, now we have to win it."

Uncertainty about the future of the world's fifth-largest oil exporter has contributed to record high oil prices, which have reached more than $46 a barrel.

The president of Venezuela's state-run oil company said Sunday the industry will enter a new period of stability and growth regardless of the vote's outcome, although he suggested that Chavez would win.

"For the oil industry, this event will contribute to stabilization," said Ali Rodriguez, the president of Petroleos de Venezuela S.A., or PDVSA. "At last our oil workers can work without the constant pressure of these (political) campaigns."

Jorge Rodriguez, a director of the elections council, said voter participation could reach a record high. Chavez called on the opposition to accept the results, and pledged that he would also do so.

"We are waiting calmly and are preparing mentally, and with a lot of joy, to accept the result, no matter what the result will be," Chavez said after casting his ballot in a poor Caracas neighborhood.

Venezuelans could either vote "no" to allow Chavez to serve out the remainder of his six-year term, which began in 2000, or "yes" to recall him. For Chavez to lose, more must vote against him than the nearly 3.8 million who voted for him in the 2000 presidential elections, and there must also be more "yes" votes than "no" votes.

If Chavez loses, he would step down immediately and Vice President Jose Vicente Rangel would take over until an election is held within 30 days. Chavez has said he plans to run in the new election if he is ousted in the referendum.

The referendum culminates a two-year drive to oust Chavez, which included a short-lived 2002 coup, a devastating two-month strike and political riots last March that claimed a dozen lives.

School district faces $1.4 million cut in budget for upcoming academic year

District trims transportation, janitor services

By Melissa Baier
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 school district was forced to cut $1.4 million from their budget, and next year the administrators fear they will be required to cut another staggering $1.4 million, Superintendent Sharol Little said.

"We're trying to look through the eyes of the wise consumer," Little said. "Anything that touches the students, we try to cut that last."

Thus far, every program has been affected in some way by these cuts, she said.

Michele Jones, director of public relations for the district, said USD 383 will no longer provide transportation for students who live further than 2.5 miles from the school.

Jones said the state will not reimburse the school for traveling expenses accumulated by traveling beyond that perimeter; consequently, 100 students will be forced to find another means of transportation.

In addition to the transportation cuts, the school system will no longer employ full-time janitorial services; instead, cleaning crews will sanitize each building, Little said. She said she hopes this system will be more efficient.

Little said she asked each principal to eliminate one coach from every sporting event.

However, she said many of the principals chose to forgo such actions in favor of going without new uniforms.

In addition to these cuts, the school board was forced to make sacrifices in other areas as well.

Forty-four positions were vacated as employees were either laid off or voluntarily left their positions in order to find jobs offering more security than the currently unstable school system, Jones said.

Of those positions, she said approximately 12 were teachers, which led to a juggling of other teachers to ensure that all classes will be taught. Fortunately, she said, all of the teachers are already qualified and won't require re-certification.

Jones said not all the openings could be filled by shuffling; however, she said some have been rehired and the rest have been covered adequately by willing and cooperative teachers.

Perhaps the greatest challenge teachers and students will face, Little said, is the lack of resources at their disposal. She said teachers have a budget for teaching supplies and materials, as of August when the annual budget was approved. The allotment for those funds was cut in half.

The USD 383 school board played an integral part in deciding which programs would be cut and how.

Walter Pesaresi said the school board has been trying to cut funds from programs that don't directly touch the students the past two years, but unfortunately this is no longer an option.

Next year the school board will be forced to cut programs that directly affect students, Pesaresi said.

The only other option, he said, is to close another school.

"That's still a real possibility," Pesaresi said.

Little said the school is "hoping to accept grants, do more fund-raisers, partner more with businesses, figure out ways to save, or do without."

The USD 383 school board and the Parent Teacher Association already have shown interest in helping with fund-raisers in order to buffer these budget hits, she said. The Local Option Budget, a program providing an option to raise taxes to assist local schools, is at a maximum of 25 percent, and taxes cannot be raised again.

Currently, the school district is part of a class-action lawsuit, known as "Schools for Fair Funding," in conjunction with Salina, Hays, and Dodge City, among other school districts.

These mid-sized districts have lower enrollment than that of larger schools, but not low enough to qualify for a weighting system provided to allot more funds to smaller schools, which makes it difficult to make ends meet, Jones said.

Democrat cautions on CIA director debates

By Leigh Strope
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON - The top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee warned fellow Democrats in the Senate on Sunday against trying to block the nomination of Rep. Porter Goss as CIA director, saying that would be picking the wrong fight in this election year.

Democrats should ask tough questions of Goss, R-Fla., at Senate confirmation hearings next month, but "my view is this is the wrong fight," Rep. Jane Harman, D-Calif., said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

"To get stuck in a fight about Porter Goss after tough questions are asked of Porter Goss is not where we ought to be this fall," said Harman.

Goss resigned as chairman of the House intelligence panel last week after President Bush nominated him to replace George Tenet at CIA.

Harman said Congress should move swiftly to push through recommendations from the Sept. 11 commission, including creating a new national intelligence director.

Bush "missed an opportunity" for intelligence reform by nominating Goss as permanent CIA director, she said.

Many Democrats have criticized the selection of Goss, saying he is too partisan for a job that requires relating objective advice to policy makers.

But Democrats also are mindful of the 2002 congressional elections in which the White House and Republicans put them in a political box regarding creation of the new Homeland Security Department.

K-State leaders offer insight into success in student life

Staying involved key to survival, students, administrators say

By Katie Payne
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

PAT BOSCO, DEAN OF STUDENT LIFE

Pat Bosco, Associate Vice President for Institutional Advancement and Dean of Student Life, said he counts K-State athletics, family vacations and poker among his favorite leisure activities. He has a doctorate in higher educational administration from the University of Nebraska.

Bosco
DEAN OF STUDENT LIFE

In his official capacity, Bosco is involved with student life programming, admissions, new student services, crises and fundraising. He works closely with Housing and Dining Services, the K-State Student Union, Recreational Services and fraternities and sororities.

K-State has seen increases from $800,000 in scholarship funds to over $6 million, and enrollment increases from 17 to 23 thousand during Bosco's tenure.

"These changes occurred while maintaining the philosophy of putting students first," Bosco said. "The students, faculty outreach to students, and leadership make K-State special."

This semester Bosco said he is looking forward to the completion of suites in Ford Hall and the plans for Jardine Apartments renovation. Also on his calendar is the expansion of family day, a new program for legacies and closer affiliation with the Greek community.

To new K-State students, Bosco said he advises going to class, getting help early, and looking for activities outside of class.

"It's not the mistake you make. It's how you react to it," he said. "Reaction determines learning."

DUANE NELLIS, PROVOST
Provost Duane Nellis worked at Kansas State for 17 years before leaving in 1997 with his wife.

"When we first came here in 1980, we thought we would leave in three or four years," Nellis said. "Manhattan really became a special place to us."

Nellis will serve as Chief Academic Officer for the university. Provost responsibilities include overseeing technological support, and working with vice provosts and deans.

PROVOST

When President Jon Wefald is gone from campus, Nellis acts as his representative.

"I have a lot of respect for President Wefald. I wanted to be part of his leadership team and legacy of success," he said. Since his return to K-State this summer, Nellis has been touring the facilities and meeting with the deans of the different colleges to learn about specific programs.

Nellis earned his doctorate in geography from the University of Oregon and is happy to be living in the Flint Hills again. He feels students and their appreciation of values make Kansas State special, and would like to welcome new students into the K-State family.

"Take advantage of all the opportunities here. K-State has a dynamic learning environment," said Nellis.

HAYLEY URKEVICH, STUDENT BODY PRESIDENT

New Student Body President Hayley Urkevich, senior in finance, has been active in student government since interning as a freshman. She served as ambassador and has also served two years as senator for the College of Business.

"Through working in Student Senate I've seen a lot of student leadership," Urkevich said. "I know Erik and I work well together to get our initiatives put into action."

Some of those initiatives include implementation of the student information portal project and working for single digit tuition increases for next year.

As president, she will be a liaison between students, administration and the Board of Regents, as well as interacting with student body presidents from other universities in Kansas.

Urkevich said meeting and working with new people was the best aspect of her presidency.

"I'm excited to get to know as many people as I can, and Erik and my office doors will always be open," she said.

A member of Mortar Board and Alpha Delta Pi, Urkevich is considering law school or returning to the accounting firm Ernst & Young, where she worked this summer.

"I chose Kansas State because it's a university that puts students first," Urkevich said. "Erik and I are looking forward to making positive changes for K-State."

JON WEFALD, PRESIDENT

When President Jon Wefald came to K-State, he had lots of challenges awaiting him.

"Enrollment was slipping, morale was down. I wanted to improve all aspects of the university and institute team leadership," Wefald said. "I

STUDENT BODY PRESIDENT

Wefald
PRESIDENT

wanted to make Kansas State better every day and every week."

Since his arrival in 1986, K-State has added more than two million square feet in new buildings and seen research grants rise from $17 million to more than $100 million.

As president, Wefald reports to the Kansas Board of Regents, and represents Kansas State to the state legislature.

Much of his time is spent working with groups such as alumni, student and faculty senates, and in a fundraising capacity.

"Every day is different. Much of the job is problem solving, and I get to work with many different groups of people," he said.

Wefald earned his doctorate in American History from the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor, and when he has leisure time, he said he enjoys reading political biographies and playing tennis.

For new students he has some words of advice.

"It's very important not to miss class," he said. "Do what is necessary and required and you will succeed."

ERIK ANKROM, STUDENT BODY VICE PRESIDENT

Although he expects to spend between 30 and 40 hours per week on student body vice presidential duties, Erik Ankrom, senior in management information systems, is still a regular student with a 15-hour semester schedule.

"School is still my number one priority," Ankrom said. "I could have graduated a little sooner, but I didn't really have to give up any commitments."

Erik said he plans to remain actively involved with his fraternity, Alpha Tau Omega. After graduation his plans include working for the Cerner Corporation where he interned this summer.

As student body vice president, Ankrom will work closely with the Student Governing Association and the university administration. He also will serve as chair for the Education Opportunity Fund, which deals with scholarships.

A majority of his time will be spent implementing the student information portal project, a major component of the Urkevich-Ankrom platform. "My favorite aspect of the job is the possibility of dealing with diverse types of people," Ankrom said.

For the fall 2004 semester, in addition to football season, Ankrom is looking forward to beginning the programs he and Student Body President Hayley Urkevich promised in their campaign.

"It's a chance to make a difference, to make K-State a better place," Ankrom said.

Ankrom said he considers being vice president a chance to give back to K-State.

"I never really considered another option," he said. "I would encourage new students to get involved whether it's a club, a fraternity or sorority, or another organization."

Explosions echo throughout Iraq after Najaf ceasefire

By Abdul Hussein Al-Obeidi
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NAJAF, Iraq - U.S. tanks and troops rolled back Sunday into the center of Najaf and battled with Shiite militants, reigniting violence in the holy city just as delegates in Baghdad opened a conference meant to be a landmark in the country's movement toward democracy.

The collapse of the ceasefire in Najaf after the failure of negotiations cast a shadow over the National Conference in Baghdad, which gathered 1,000 religious, tribal and political leaders from across Iraq. Some of the delegates threatened to walk out unless the government of Prime Minister Ayad Allawi put an end to the fighting.

In more of the violence plaguing the country, insurgents fired a mortar barrage hours after the conference opened - apparently targeting Baghdad's Green Zone district where the gathering was taking place but instead hitting a commuter bus station, killing two people and wounding 17 others, according to the Health Ministry.

Also in Baghdad, a roadside bomb killed a U.S. soldier hours before the conference began. At least 931 U.S. servicemembers have died in Iraq since March 2003.

In the volatile Sunni city of Fallujah, west of Baghdad, U.S. warplanes bombed three neighborhoods Sunday afternoon, killing five civilians and wounding six others, said, Dr. Adil Khamis, of Fallujah General Hospital.

Afghan army called to stop violence between warlords

Taliban soldiers kill local leader in connection with elections

By Stephen Graham
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KABUL, Afghanistan — Government troops intervened in Afghanistan's latest outbreak of deadly fighting between warlords, flying from the capital to the far west on U.S. and NATO airplanes to retake an air base contested in the violence, officials said Sunday.

Meanwhile, in another illustration of the insecurity dogging the run-up to October elections, Taliban militants killed a community leader for encouraging people to vote and gunned down six Afghan soldiers at a checkpoint, officials said.

The U.S.-trained Afghan National Army's move in the far western province of Herat was the latest instance of President Hamid Karzai trying to quell local conflicts in a country where large areas are controlled by warlords and their leaders.

And though the soldiers seized the contested airbase at Shindand, 370 miles west of the capital, Kabul, battles continued between the forces of Herat Gov. Ismail Khan and several rival warlords.

One of the rivals, Amanullah, said his men exchanged artillery with Khan's troops and beat off one attempted offensive Sunday north of Shindand. He said his opponents had brought tanks and rocket launchers to the front line, but that there were no fresh casualties.

The national army troops moved into the Shindand base overnight. Forces loyal to Amanullah, who captured the base from pro-Khan fighters a day earlier, left without resistance.

"We left, and they entered," said Amanullah, an ethnic Pashtun commander who uses only one name. "All our troops have moved to the front lines."

A statement from President Hamid Karzai's office said he was "pleased" with the swift action of the army.

Further operations by the warring militias "will not be tolerated," it said.

But it was not clear how Karzai would resolve a dispute that exposes anew how warlords — not the central government — control swaths of the country more than two years after the fall of the Taliban.

Khan, an ethnic Tajik, has long dominated Herat.

Amanullah and at least two other commanders launched simultaneous attacks against Khan's forces around the province on Friday. They have voiced support for Karzai, a fellow Pashtun.

But some officials in Kabul were quick to denounce them.

"The militia attacked Herat's legal government," said Mohammed Zahir Azimi, a spokesman for the Tajik-led Defense Ministry.

"It is an illegal action that benefits Afghanistan's enemies."

The national army troops who arrived in Shindand were an advance party of some 1,500 government soldiers leaving the capital on planes provided by the American and NATO-led forces in Afghanistan.

Trucks loaded with Afghan soldiers rumbled into Kabul's airport Sunday afternoon with U.S. soldiers at the wheel and manning machine-guns mounted on the cabs.

Karzai has sent units from the force — always accompanied by American trainers — to trouble spots across the north and west this year.

The deployments have had a frosty welcome from regional power brokers including Khan, who have also resisted a U.N.-sponsored drive to disarm their private armies, but have faced no major battles.

The United Nations is concerned that the failure to control the warlords leaves Afghanistan's first-ever presidential election on Oct. 9 vulnerable to intimidation.

About 10 million Afghans have signed up for the election, according to U.N. figures released on Sunday, the last official day for registration.

Despite anecdotal evidence of fraud and underage registration — the rough estimate of the electorate was only 9.8 million — officials hail the turnout as evidence of Afghans' yearning for peace.

Voters have signed up despite bombings and shootings blamed on the Taliban that have killed more than 30 election workers and civilians registered for the poll.

In the latest attacks, suspected Taliban beat a tribal council member, Dilber Khan, in Kandahar's Maruf district for urging people to vote, said district chief Syed Ali.

Khan died from his injuries Sunday, Ali said.

Taliban also attacked a checkpoint in southern Kandahar province before dawn Sunday, killing six Afghan soldiers before fleeing, police said.

In another incident, U.S. and Afghan forces backed by helicopters killed seven suspected Taliban and detained 11 more in the remote mountains near Kandahar, the provincial government spokesman said.

Preparations have proceeded regardless, with a huge transport plane from Denmark disgorging 30,000 white plastic ballot boxes in the capital on Sunday.

The registration result "shows the tremendous wish of Afghans to participate," U.N. spokesman Manoel de Almeida e Silva said. "People want to leave behind the years of violence."

Musadeq Sadeq | THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Eligible Afghan women wait to get their voter registration cards at a mosque in Kabul, Afghanistan on Sunday in order to take part in the forthcoming presidential election. About 10 million Afghans have signed up for the election, according to U.N. figures released on Sunday, the last official day for registration.

He said the questions people have are mostly easy to solve.

"So far, people just need passwords reset, or they are not able to log in, but these problems are ones that we have every year," Stone said.

Stone said students may notice the visual changes, but there are also many functional changes to help users.

"The first thing people notice is the visual aesthetics of it, it has a cleaner more professional look," Stone said.

Quentin Stoll, graduate student in biological and agricultural engineering, has used the new Webmail only once since the change, but has seen the benefits.

"I noticed that you can send bigger files than before. That is especially beneficial to me since I am working on my thesis, it has a lot of pictures and takes up about five megabytes. I was able to send it to my professor, since he is out of town," Stoll said.

Gould said he is pleased with the changes.

"I think the main reason people like Webmail so much is the ease of use. No mail client needs to be installed, so you can check it anywhere, anytime," Gould said.

development for international programs and Hale Library, said having detainment status provides the workers with fewer rights than had they been charged with a crime and arrested.

If that were the situation, she said, they would have the right to an attorney.

Until they go before a court, she said, their citizenship status remains undetermined. Because of this, attorneys from Junction City's legal services have been investigating the situation.

Meanwhile, Eustolia Garcia said she will continue to wait for information about her husband, Ramon Gonzalez, who was head cook at El Cazador and is now one of the detainees.

She brought her 10-month-old child to the RCPD, hoping for a chance to visit with Gonzalez about what the family should do without his income.

"We feel bad. It's been too many days without any communication with him," Garcia said in Spanish. "They know there's nothing. All they found is money, and that's from working."

Bombs explode during India's Independence Day

Officials target liberation group as main suspect

By Ashok Sharma
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW DELHI — A time bomb buried in a parade grounds exploded during Independence Day celebrations Sunday in India's remote northeast, killing 15 people, seven of them schoolchildren, while rocket attack hit celebrations at a school in Kashmir, wounding 17, officials said.

The attacks came as Prime Minister Manmohan Singh pledged to fight terrorism during a speech at New Delhi's 17th century Red Fort, a tradition followed by each prime minister since India gained independence from two centuries of British colonial rule on Aug. 15, 1947.

"We will fight terrorism forcefully. Let there be no doubt about it," Singh said in his speech.

He reiterated the warning later Sunday as he expressed his condolences to the families of the victims.

"Such dastardly acts show the terrorists' disregard for innocent lives."

The perpetrators of such acts of violence will not be spared and the country's resolve to eliminate the scourge of terrorism remains unshaken," Singh said in a statement.

The powerful bomb blast ripped through the grounds of a local college in Dhemaji, a remote town in the northeastern Assam state, where a parade was being held, killing 15 people, said state Home Minister Rockybul Hussain.

Another 21 people were wounded, he said.

"It was a timer device buried in the ground," he said. Dhemaji is 1,015 miles northeast of New Delhi.

Another explosion also took place in the nearby town of Dhakuakhana minutes before a parade could start there. No casualties were reported.

The outlawed United Liberation Front of Asom was suspected of being behind the two attacks, said Assam Inspector General of Police Khagen Sharma.

Until last year, suspected rebels mainly targeted trains, rail tracks, road bridges, oil pipelines and government soldiers.

The ULFA had called for a boycott of the Independence Day celebrations. The group has been fighting for a separate homeland since 1979 in a separate insurgency that has left more than 10,000 dead in the past decade.

No one claimed responsibility for the attack in the Indian-controlled portion of Kashmir, injuring 17 people, mostly schoolchildren.

The children had gathered at the school in Dangiachi village to see the ceremony, which was organized by the local contingent of the Indian army, when the attack occurred. The injured included two soldiers, police officer Riaz Ahmad said.

The village is located about 45 miles north of Srinagar, the summer capital of Jammu-Kashmir state.

Separatists have been fighting for some 15 years for Kashmir's independence from India or its merger with Pakistan.

More than 65,000 people have been killed in the conflict since 1989.

India accuses Pakistan of training and arming the Islamic militants, a charge Pakistan denies.

University starts policy on attendance

By Scott Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students thinking about skipping the first day of class may want to reconsider before Wednesday.

Faculty Senate voted last spring to allow professors to drop students who do not show up for the first day of a class from class rosters.

Hayley Urkevich, student body president, said the policy officially went into effect this semester.

"As it stands right now the drop policy is, they could drop any student who is not in attendance at the beginning of the first day of class," Urkevich said.

She said the policy passed through Senate despite Student Governing Association's reservations about its strict wording.

"We would have liked to see it changed before this semester, but it just wasn't going to happen," Urkevich said. "We will continue to work through the academic affairs committee and try to reach a compromise."

David Stewart, member of Senate's academic affairs committee and assistant dean for continuing education, said the policy would benefit students.

"The primary concern had to do with students who were being denied access to some courses because those courses had filled," Stewart said. "Part of the intent as I understood it was to Access restricted for international student shuttle

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The International Student Shuttle will be less crowded due to a new policy.

In order to meet state regulations, the shuttle is no longer allowed to transport any person that is not affiliated with K-State — including spouses and children of students.

Although the regulations always have been in place, they have been enforced more heavily during the summer.

In the past the shuttle has provided transportation to the grocery store for international families.

Kelly Thacker, assistant coordinator at Jardine Apartments, said the state imposed rules make shopping more difficult for international students.

"We have so many people we are trying to serve who have spouses or children," she said. "It's such a struggle for them to get their groceries without public transportation in the city."

Dave Gronquist, director of administration for facilities, said he understands the problem, but it's still a state vehicle.

"As a state supported vehicle, what's the difference between them being able to use this to go to Wal-Mart and someone else using it to do the same?" he said. "It's state money and it's state property — we have to take care of it in that manner."

The K-State shuttle originated from an idea that started at Jardine. Thacker said volunteers drove their own vehicles, and there were no restrictions on who could ride.

Mary Beth Cook, graduate assistant for the Office of International Programs, said the current shuttle is a collaboration between the Office of International Programs and Jardine.

"Jardine was already doing it, so when we received funding to do it through the Office of International Programs, we included them in the program," she said.

Upperclassmen assist freshmen with moving into residence halls

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When students moved into the residence halls Monday, they were greeted by temperatures in the mid 70s, a welcome change from the 106 degree temperatures students faced last year.

But Luke Oplinger, senior in hotel and restaurant management, still was covered in sweat as he carried a load up the Boyd Hall stairwell to a fourth floor room. Oplinger was one of the many FarmHouse members helping freshmen move into the halls.

"They're awesome," Caitlin Peterson, freshman in elementary education, said after Oplinger and a few other Farm House members carried some of her roommate's belongings to her fourth floor room.

Peterson said they were very friendly and strong.

Helping incoming students move into the residence halls is something Oplinger said Farm House members do annually.

"That's what's nice about a place like K-State," he said. "Everybody helps everybody else with their stuff move in."

Jessica Drugg, freshman in interior design and French, and her mother, Jane received help from about five FarmHouse members as the student moved into her second floor room.

"I think it's absolutely marvelous," Jane Drugg said. "It's a great big help for those of us who are a little older."

Camilla Jones, residence life coordinator for the Strong Complex, said family members unload vehicles and then move-in volunteers take the loads up to the rooms.

"It shows new students and parents dedication and a willingness to help," she said.

Hall residents upgrade network protections

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Joshua Williams waited an hour Monday evening before he was able to update his computer at Operation PC.

This year, residence hall students wishing to use Ethernet services are required to get updates to their computer systems before registering on the network.

Tim Ramsey, Computer Networking Services security officer, said the project's goal is to help prevent the problems of last year.

"From the beginning of the fall semester last year, new worms infected over 1,000 computers on campus," he said.

Williams, sophomore in chemical engineering, said he thought the process could be improved.

"They could send out a notice and maybe set up times where people could come and do it, so it wouldn't be so hectic," he said.

Each student will be given the latest version of Symantec — the corporate version of Norton Anti-Virus.

New updates also will be installed on each operating system. These updates will vary based upon which operating system the student uses and what they did to update their computers themselves, said Jim Hanck, UNIX system administrator.

Joshua Williams, sophomore in chemical engineering, unhooked his computer after he had installed the new virus protection software last night in Kramer Dining Center.

THE CAMPUS PULSE

READERS' ADVOCATE FOR THE COLLEGIAN

There is a time for laughing, a time for crying, a time for learning and a time for talking. This is your time to talk through me.

The intent of this new column, "Campus Pulse," is to give the Collegian reader a true sense of understanding student life issues at K-State, and my purpose is to act as the Collegian's liaison to the campus and vice versa. As the Collegian's readers' advocate, my response to your comments and questions will be published here every Tuesday.

I will tell you about myself because I am writing on behalf of K-State students. I am a non-traditional student, meaning I am not in the typical age range for an undergraduate student (18-24). I am from San Diego, Calif., a bartender and a junior in hotel and restaurant management with a minor in leadership studies.

CHRIS BLUIETT

Chris can be reached at cab6676@ksu.edu.

I want to learn what students' thoughts and feelings are about the issues they face. I will be here to be your voice, regarding Collegian coverage and other daily issues. I will gather information and reactions on campus. To ensure your voice is heard, e-mail me by Sunday of every week.

Each week I will provide a topic to which you can respond for next week's column.

The first topic for my column is: Are athletes treated differently than other students, and if so, is this acceptable considering the revenue they bring to K-State, and the time commitments required for athletes?

Look for the consensus on this topic in next week's Campus Pulse.

Hollister Co. moves to Manhattan

By Stephanie Swoboda
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan Town Center is growing to fit customer needs and desires.

Stores such as Trade Secret were added, and Hollister Co., a popular clothing chain, is expected to appear around October, said Sara Van Allen, marketing manager for Manhattan Town Center.

"They just began construction and are located in the space next to GNC," Van Allen said.

She dispelled the rumor of a new theater in the Manhattan Town Center.

"A theater would be a great asset, but no plans have been made for one," Van Allen said.

She said that doesn't mean there will never be one. Customers can request stores they would like to see brought to the mall.

"We love feedback," Van Allen said.

Comment cards at the customer service desk are the main reason for the appearance of a Hollister Co. store, Van Allen said.

"I think Hollister Co. will do great," she said. "We've got a great student population, and it fits in with student demographics."

Some stores may have reason to worry. But at least one manager believes the competition will be beneficial for all parties.

"Any new store in any mall creates competition, but it also means an increase in sales because more people are coming to the mall," said Nancy Haile, American Eagle Outfitters store manager.

Haile said she has no plans to compete aggressively with Hollister Co.'s opening. Rather, she plans to continue with business as usual, she said.

Conference delegates denounce Shiite cleric

By Sameer N. Yacoub
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Delegates at Iraq's National Conference called Monday for radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr to abandon his uprising against U.S. and Iraqi troops and pull his fighters out of a holy shrine in Najaf.

Al-Sadr and his followers have fought U.S. and Iraqi forces from within the Imam Ali shrine, one of Shia Islam's most sacred sites, and fighting has spread to other parts of the country.

"This is not right. We demand Muqtada al-Sadr withdraw from the holy shrine because it's not the specific property of one person," Hussein al-Sadr, a distant cousin to the cleric, told the conference.

"It belongs to everybody. Shrines should not be controlled by one man, regardless of his status."

The majority of delegates raised their hands in favor of Hussein al-Sadr's proposal to send a delegation to Najaf to meet with the militant cleric and ask him to stop fighting and join the political process.

"The door is very open to all Iraqis, regardless of their religion, ethnic background, to join the free political process," Hussein al-Sadr said.

Ahmed al-Shaibany, an aide to Muqtada al-Sadr, welcomed the conference's initiative, saying that "we are ready to accept any mediation for a peaceful solution."

Delegates also said some of al-Sadr's people attended the conference Monday for the first time since it began Sunday.

The three-day conference, with 1,300 religious, political and civic leaders in attendance, will help elect a 100-member national council that is expected to act as a watchdog over the interim government ahead of elections scheduled for January.

But the fighting in Najaf has threatened to overshadow the conference and many delegates have voiced opposition to working on democratic progress while the country is wracked by violence and military operations by coalition troops.

On Monday, Falah Hassan, from the Shiite Political Council,

Local and international media view the proceedings of the Iraq National Conference in Baghdad, Iraq, on Sunday. The media were kept in a separate room and listened to the talks via television monitors.

Alison Long
KANSAS CITY STAR

walked out of the conference, following an ultimatum his group issued on Sunday that his delegates would leave if U.S. troops didn't pull out of Najaf within 24 hours.

Some delegates expressed optimism that this first fragile taste of democracy would succeed.

"Discussions were good yesterday and we hope we can carry on and reach an agreement," said Hameed al-Kafaei, former spokesman for the now dissolved Iraqi Governing Council. "There were heated debates, emotional debates, but everyone was there, we kept on going."

The conference is an unprecedented forum for Iraqis of all ethnic and religious groups to discuss their visions for the future of their country.

TO THE POINT Installation of software aids network users

While it has been the cause of countless headaches for students arriving at the residence halls this week, Operation PC's computer security efforts are worth the wait.

In each of the dining centers on campus, technicians have assisted residence hall Ethernet users as they install anti-virus software, critical system updates and other vital upgrades onto their computers.

Long waits, confusion and frustration with the process have not been foreign to the program, but the goal — to ensure the best possible network security against continual threats and liabilities — is worth whatever temporary anguish residents and their families endure.

Previous efforts by network officials to make such software accessible to residents were laudable, but going beyond such passive means is a needed and welcomed change.

Bringing students to the Operation PC kiosks also allows those interested to ask questions of the knowledgeable staff before setting up their computer in their rooms.

The inconvenience faced by residents due to Operation PC is insignificant in comparison to the inconveniences caused if dozens or even hundreds of residents' computers succumb to security threats throughout the year.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

I would not startle you by saying, "obesity is an epidemic that is sweeping the nation" or "the weight problem is lethal." We all know that excess weight is a major problem in the United States.

Humanity's eating problems began long before the fast food revolution. The world as we know it would not have come into existence if Adam and Eve had not been tempted to eat the forbidden fruit in paradise.

If temptation has held you spellbound with fascinating pleasures of rich, creamy food or sugar-frosted cereal in colored boxes covered with cartoon characters, I would not ask you to resist them.

In short, temptation, happiness, and somehow health hazards are correlated and reciprocal to one another in our venture of life.

With much fondness, I recall a childhood filled with awe and appreciation for an overweight friend who used to protect me from bullies in school.

She grew up in her father's confectionery among tubs filled with various kinds of Asian sweets. "Rasgullaws" (fluffy cheese balls soaked in thick milk and dense sugar syrup) were real rascals behind her body volume, as well as her ever-smiling face.

She would not have been perceived as the luckiest girl in school if she had no bulky body or authority over bullies.

To me, this fat Rasgullie sugar girl, who was one day going to challenge the Japanese Sumo wrestlers, was simply a symbol of glamour and fame.

Unfortunately, the world is not so simple anymore. Through media, we constantly are bombarded by images of painfully thin superstars.

In direct competition to popular ideals of beauty, we, and billions of other weight-conscious consumers, are besieged by fast food restaurants popping up like chickenpox all over the face of the Earth. They sell Whoppers and fried chicken, a.k.a. "weapons of ass destruction."

On the other hand, a new breed of plastic surgeons is rapidly emerging on a global scale to neutralize the effects of fast food on our bodies. They are anxious to extend their services for the benefit of humanity, but at high prices.

Thousands of drug companies are hawking life-saving weight-loss products. Unfortunately, they lighten your load mostly by lightening your wallet.

Newly available drugs cannot control appetite or alter metabolic rate.

U.S. should focus on relations with China

Despite the war on terror and the occupation of Iraq, the most important country in America's long term future is China.

Our relations with the People's Republic of China often is not seen as having an immediate impact on our generation. However, it deserves our attention, even as students.

The BBC reported in July that China's Gross Domestic Product experienced 9.6% growth during the past year. James Hoge, Jr. in the July/August "Foreign Affairs," wrote that China will soon challenge the United States as the economic and political leader of the world. This challenge, he writes, may not be peaceful.

The United States has before it a great opportunity with China, one that could be lost by inaction.

On Aug. 4, National Public Radio's Rob Gifford highlighted that the Communist government in China is beginning to weaken.

In the last few years China has seen a large raise in both prostitution and religious groups. This is noteworthy because not only are both practices condemned by the Chinese government, but both had once been nearly eliminated.

The sudden rise of deviance is also important because it is taking place in largely rural areas in China, the same areas that gave birth to the Communist Revolution.

Opportunity exists for the United States to help strengthen these trends of change and by doing so promote democratic revolution and capitalism. However, in recent times, U.S. policy toward China has not supported these changes.

The Communist Party already has begun to reassert control over groups like Falun Gong. Soon, a great opportunity will have been missed.

On June 15, a congressional commission released a report noting that the United States recently has relaxed several trade disputes designed to help expose China to economic and eventually democratic change.

These relaxed disputes, the report found, allow a lopsided trade imbalance with the United States to continue. According to the congressional committee, this trade imbalance amounted to $124 billion dollars in 2003 and was rising at a rate of more than 20% last year. China's growth at our expense only encourages bitter rivalry.

U.S. policy toward China needs to focus on developing China as a partner. As students, we should take a role in shifting that focus.

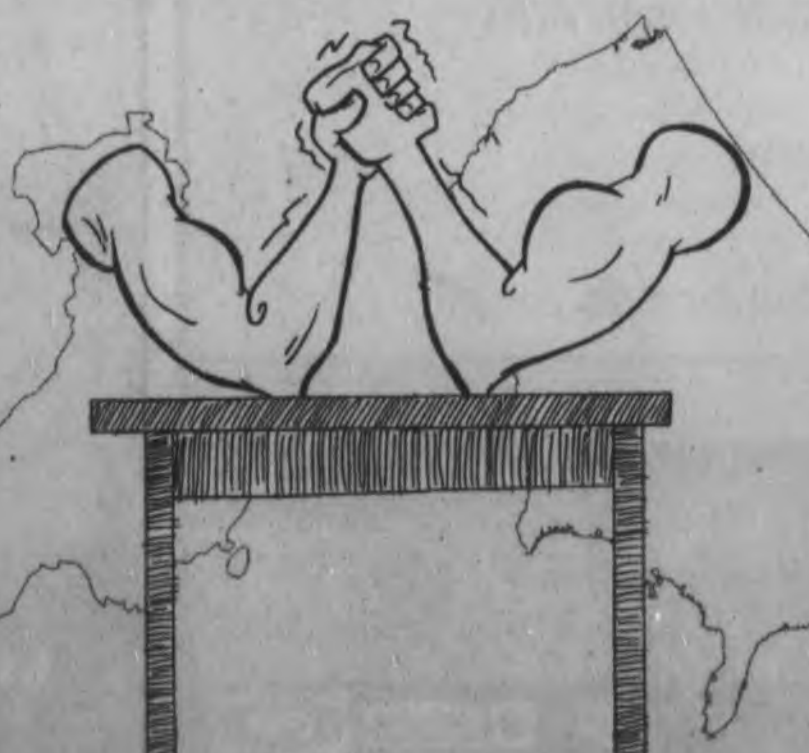

Hoge noted in his article there are about 50,000 Chinese students studying in America, with only a few thousand Americans studying in China. By taking classes on Chinese history students can take a step in helping U.S.-Chinese relations.

As students, future leaders, and citizens of today we should help the U.S.-China relationship develop into one that is characterized by peace and mutual benefits. One way we can do this is by becoming more informed about China.

How many of you know how to say hello in Mandarin or who the last emperor of China was? Everyone knows about the Holocaust, but what about the atrocities China suffered at the hands of the Japanese during World War II?

Today, we can prevent another conflict of such scale by understanding how China is developing economically and culturally and demanding that adequate attention is given to it.

Healing begins for storm victims

By Vickie Chachere
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PUNTA GORDA, Fla. — Driven from splintered trailers, roofless condos and powerless suburban homes, Hurricane Charley's hungry victims sweated through long lines Monday to find food, showers and drinking water three days after the storm left their lives in shambles.

Barbara Winslow and her fiancé were sitting in a van with five antsy children in a thunderstorm waiting for a chance to collect diapers, food, water and ice at a National Guard comfort station.

"After you live through it, you can't imagine how desperate you get," she said. "You don't have anything. If the end of the world came tomorrow, this is what it would look like."

For Winslow and many others, the relief over having survived started to be replaced by the reality of a long rebuilding process.

Some of the 15,000 residents of Punta Gorda, one of the towns President Bush visited earlier this week, waited 30 minutes for ice, water and portable commodes set up by the National Guard. Volunteer Jessica Byrnes held 4-month-old Brody Keener near an electric fan connected to a generator. The baby, dressed only in a diaper, managed a slight smile.

"He can't keep anything down, it's so hot," said Alyssa Thibodeau, who was baby-sitting her cousin as his parents sought supplies.

"We keep giving him ice water and washing him. He's hanging in there."

Punta Gorda and Port Charlotte were among the hardest-hit areas, and 25 of Florida's 67 counties were designated federal disaster areas. At least 17 people in Florida were killed by the storm, and officials estimate it caused as much as $11 billion in damage to insured homes alone. Earlier, Charley killed four people in Cuba and one in Jamaica.

About 790,000 people remained without power Monday, and officials estimated it could take weeks to get it fully restored. At least 150,000 were without local phone service.

About 2,300 people stayed in shelters, and Federal Emergency Management Agency director Michael Brown said 11,000 have already applied for disaster aid. Federal officials said they received 20,000 catastrophic housing request 10,000 on Monday alone.

Brown said it could take several weeks to find all the victims, and officials still had no count Monday of how many people remained unaccounted for, a mission complicated by toppled power lines, spotty phone communication and roads littered with debris. However, early estimates of hundreds of people missing are probably inflated, officials said.

"That's an issue of cousin Vinny in Ohio calling down to find out how his brother-in-law is doing and he's not where he's supposed to be," said Wayne Salade, Charlotte County's director of emergency management. "Odds are he's not missing at all."

Frustrations began to emerge on a typically muggy day as people complained about the lack of power and access to their neighborhoods. Some Sanibel Island residents accused city officials of creating a double standard.

"They're allowing the elite of Sanibel on the island, and the rest of us can't even look," said Richard Strong, a 49-year-old house painter.

Temperatures flared at a bridge crossing to Fort Myers Beach. Officers used a stun gun to subdue a man in a minivan who wanted to enter the area still closed to residents, WINK-TV said.

Gasoline was precious, with lines of 40 cars at some stations. Lines also snaked through parking lots at food distribution sites.

"I just want something to eat," house cleaner Willie Mae Robinson said as she waited for canned goods and ice with several dozen others at an old train depot in Bowling Green, where temperatures soared into the high 80s.

"I have something for today but I don't have anything for tomorrow."

Dream ends for Olympic basketball team

ANTHONY MENDOZA

Today, Dream Team IV takes the court against host Greece, armed with superior talent, size and athletic ability.

But the buzz is gone.

The original Dream Team, comprised of Michael Jordan, Larry Bird and Magic Johnson, won games before stepping on the court as opponents stood in awe.

Watching the games in Barcelona was a sideshow.

Would Charles Barkley create an international incident by elbowing an opponent in the head?

How many points could the United States beat their highly overmatched opponent by — 20, 30, or maybe 50?

However, this current group of mostly B-level NBA players gets our attention in a different way.

We watch to see if they lose and by how much.

Carlos Arroyo and Eddie Casiano are not names that get worldwide interest, but both outscored the supposed world's best players in the United States' 92-73 loss to Puerto Rico Sunday in the opening round game of Olympic competition.

The loss was the United States' first of the Dream Team-era and third in 112 games.

How the current and future problem can be fixed is simple.

The powers that be should not go backwards and select players from college or send the NCAA champion to represent the United States.

Rather they should keep the current system, but make commitments a priority at least two years in advance.

Put it on the players to make an early commitment to their country and don't put together the most athletic group, but a team instead.

If there is any doubt that solid teams win over talent-laden rosters, just think about who has won professional titles the last few years.

The New England Patriots won twice in three years without a definite star.

The Florida Marlins beat the mighty New York Yankees in seven games, and this past year the Detroit Pistons took apart the Los Angeles Lakers in dominant fashion in the NBA Finals.

This is not Team U.S.A., but rather Team ESPN.

It's a group made up of Sportscenter highlights, whether it be an Allen Iverson cross-over or LeBron James breakaway 360 dunk.

The above men are not basketball players — the real players play internationally.

They make their free throws, make half of their shots from the field and knock down the outside shot to open up the middle.

The United States did none of these things in their loss.

Will they bounce back today and win? Probably.

The only NBA player on the Greece roster is Jake Tsakalidis, who is characterized as a big man who takes up space in the paint.

The only reason they are in the Games is because they received an automatic berth for being the host country.

Like a car wreck, we all will watch to see what happens next, because the last time the United States lost in international play — to Italy in an Olympic prep game — it nearly lost two days later to a German team that didn't even qualify for the Games.

NBC may not be airing new episodes of "Friends," but this year's Dream Team is "must see TV."

It is a reality show gone bad if you can handle turnovers, horrible outside shooting and poor defense by million dollar athletes who don't seem to care.

Former coach returns to equestrian team

By Zachary Payne
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Change is the perfect word to describe the new environment in the K-State equestrian program.

Following Lindsay Breidenthal's resignation in March, Teresa Slough was named head coach on May 26 and began her official duties Aug. 10.

Slough is no stranger to either K-State or the equestrian program.

The St. Francis, Kan., native obtained her bachelor's and master's degrees at K-State.

She also was the first Wildcat equestrian coach, as she led the team during its inaugural season as a varsity sport in 2000.

In three years away from K-State, she continuously worked toward a doctoral degree in animal science and reproductive physiology at Colorado State University. Slough will defend her dissertation in December.

Slough said it was her fondness for K-State and the equestrian program that brought her back to the university.

"I love Manhattan, I love K-State, and I loved working with the equestrian team when I was here before," she said.

However, there are a few changes that have taken place while Slough has been away.

Slough
EQUESTRIAN HEAD COACH

Slough said she regretted K-State was rezoned and is now the lone varsity team in its zone.

During Slough's first season, the Wildcats were in Zone 7 with Big 12 schools Oklahoma State and Texas A&M. They have since moved into Zone 9 where they face only teams who carry equestrian as a club sport.

Slough said she wishes her riders could compete against other varsity teams throughout the year, because it would benefit them to face top varsity competition at regional and national championships in the spring.

Both Slough and assistant coach Meghan Cunningham said they hope to send both the English and Western disciplines to nationals.

Cunningham also said she was pleased that Slough was returning to coach at K-State.

"Teresa will be a great addition and will bring great leadership to the program," she said.

On Friday, the equestrian team will have an informational meeting for returning riders and any riders who wish to try out for the team this season.

All riders, even those returning from last season, must try out for the team.

Sophomore Macie Ayers said she is looking forward to the new season.

"This change is going to bring about a stronger more unified team, and I'm excited to see the progress that the team will make this season," Ayers said.

The Wildcats will begin their season Sep. 25 in Kirksville, Mo., at the Truman State Western Show.

Women's tennis team looks to improve after difficult year

By Michael Ashford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coming off a season which saw its record slide from 15-8 the previous year to a paltry 5-15 — including a mere 1-10 in Big 12 play — the women's tennis team has a simple goal this season.

"To be better than last year," senior Maria Rosenberg said.

Rosenberg, coming off All-Big 12 honors in singles and doubles play last spring, said the team looks to move on and let go of last season's disappointments.

"We are going to forget about what happened last year and try to improve," Rosenberg said. "We have new players, new situations, so we are just going to do our best."

Rosenberg finished last year as a bright spot in an otherwise dark season. She went 20-16 in singles play and won a Big 12 Championship in number-one doubles with former Wildcat Paulina Castillejos.

Now, Rosenberg said she looks to finish strong in her senior campaign.

"I'm going to try to do the best I can and play as well as I can and train hard," she said.

But even with the struggles of last spring, Coach Steve Bietau said he refuses to believe that it was an issue of his players' capabilities.

Instead, Bietau said lack of depth was the culprit for his teams' mishaps.

"Depth has been an issue for us for five or six years. Through that period of time, we've had some pretty good teams, some very good teams, but we've always been right on the edge where one injury or one changed commitment from a recruit could either put us over the top or really damage us," he said.

"The averages caught up with us last year."

With four of the top six players returning from last year's squad, Bietau said he is looking to a few returning players and some talented newcomers to step up and fill the voids left by graduation at the number three and four positions on the team.

Runners prep for upcoming season

By Anthony Mendoza
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

All-Big 12 runner Stefanie Murer is no longer around.

Neither is former head coach Randy Cole, who guided the women's cross country team to regional titles in 1998, 1999, and 2000, along with a Big 12 Championship in 1998.

Some might believe losing a top runner and a coach in the same year would lead to a disappointing overall season, but first-year coach Michael Smith — who spent 10 years as a Wildcat assistant — said he expects this year's teams to finish in the top half of the conference.

"Our expectations are higher than they were a year ago," Smith said. "We finished ninth with the men and seventh with the women, and we have better personnel across the board. So on paper we're better, and if they perform up to their capabilities, I would expect that we can finish higher than seventh or ninth."

Murer will not return to K-State this season for her sophomore year, opting to stay in Switzerland to continue her education. Cole took the head-coaching position at the University of Wyoming in January.

Last year, Murer finished as the top Wildcat runner in three of six team meets, placing first at the Wildcat Invitational and fifth at the Big 12 Championships.

Smith said the men's team is the best it's been in six years, led by two-time All-Big 12 standout Mathew Chesang.

The senior led the Wildcats in every meet last year, winning the Hurricane Festival and Wildcat Invitational. He finished fifth at the Big 12 Championships.

"I think we can be in the top five or better in conference, better than we were the last two years," Chesang said.

With the loss of Murer, senior Trisha Culbertson is the top returning runner for the Wildcats. An Academic All-American, Trisha Culbertson, shown here competing in May with the women's track team, is the top returning runner for the Wildcats. She won the Hurricane Festival last season and was also an Academic All-American.

Culbertson led K-State in three meets last season, winning the Hurricane Festival.

Smith is relying on junior college transfer Christina Lara to round out the women's top-five runners.

Last year, the women's team failed to finish top-five in any meet in October where at-large points are accumulated towards the NCAA team championship.

"We had bodies out there — young kids, but finishing 70th or 60th is not necessarily where we want our fifth person to finish," Smith said. "This year we expect them to finish higher."

MCBB | Wildcats to tour Canada in October

Men's basketball coach Jim Wooldridge announced Monday the Wildcats will play four exhibition games in Canada this fall.

The Wildcats will tour British Columbia Oct. 8-12, playing against Simon Fraser, Langara College, the University of British Columbia and Trinity Western University.

To prepare for the trip, Wooldridge will hold 10 practices starting Wednesday.

Early fall practices are permissible under NCAA rules when a school is playing in a foreign fall exhibition tour. Rules state a team can participate in an exhibition tour every four years.

CBSB | Hill adds former All-American to staff

K-State pitchers will have the opportunity to learn from a former All-American this season.

Head baseball coach Brad Hill announced the hiring of former Central Missouri State pitcher Josh Reynolds as a volunteer assistant coach Monday.

Reynolds will work alongside assistant pitching coach Sean McCann with the pitching staff, as well as take on various administrative duties with the Wildcats.

Drafted in 2000 by the New York Mets in the third round, Reynolds lettered for Hill's Central Missouri State squad from 1998-2000.

With the Mules, Reynolds was a two-time MIAA and All-American pitcher and holds the school's career record for wins with 32.

He played five seasons in the minor leagues in the Boston and San Diego organizations.

Olympics | Phelps falls short of chance to tie record

ATHENS, Greece — The kid couldn't catch the Thorpedo — and he won't be catching Mark Spitz, either.

Michael Phelps' quest for seven gold medals ended after just three events, doomed by another bronze Monday night in the most anticipated race at the Olympic pool — the head-to-head showdown with Australia's Ian Thorpe in the 200-meter freestyle.

Even though he'll fall short of Spitz, Phelps has plenty of swimming left in Athens. He returned to the pool just 52 minutes later for the semifinals of the 200 butterfly. There's still the very real possibility that he'll win eight medals — they just won't all be gold.

Spitz was in Athens for the Olympics and expected to attend the race. He has said he didn't mind losing his record, but it will remain his for at least another four years.

Olympics | U.S. softball wins in extra inning

ATHENS, Greece — Helped by two errors, one on a ball lost in the unforgiving Mediterranean glare, the Americans scored three runs in the eighth inning Monday for a 3-0 win over Japan. The victory extends the U.S. team's winning streak to 73 games.

Cat Osterman pitched a one-hitter with 11 strikeouts as the United States (3-0) remained the only unbeaten team in the eight-team tournament — barely.

After two blowouts to open round-robin play, the U.S. team couldn't get a hit for the first seven innings. But Japan couldn't score either, and the game went to the international tiebreaker where each team gets to start the eighth inning with a runner at second base.

Consistently cool

Abstract lyrics, vocals make Sonic Youth CD strong

Twenty years ago, most K-State students were barely out of diapers and definitely not conscious enough to recognize or define what was cool.

Sonic Youth already was becoming one of the most influential bands in the no wave movement 20 years ago. Like a contemporary Velvet Underground in terms of influence outside of the mainstream, Sonic Youth defined cool a decade before the plaid-clad alternative scene began railing with its unmistakably detached air.

To someone unfamiliar with the band, it is almost impossible to describe the sound Sonic Youth mastered in those decades.

Sonic Youth is the leader of a genre of music commonly known as noise rock/no wave, a style of music developed in the early 1980s as an experimental outgrowth of punk rock.

Unlike blues or rock music, no wave has no fixed harmony.

There usually is a rather abrasive, atonal sound and a strong emphasis on repetitive rhythm. Sonic Youth has emerged from this scene with their often abstract lyrics and always avant garde sound.

"Sonic Nurse" is the 19th release from Sonic Youth, picking up where "Murray Street" (2002) left off. However, "Sonic Nurse" is probably one of the best Sonic Youth releases since "Dirty."

The album begins on a strong note with the throaty vocals of Kim Gordon kicking off "Pattern Recognition." The rhythm-heavy, churning rock song sets the stage for an album heavy in Gordon's vocals.

Clocking in at almost four minutes, "Unmade Bed" is the shortest song on "Sonic Nurse" and also one of the best. Thurston Moore's vocals sound eerily like Neil Young on a track that could have been written by Young.

"Dripping Dream" is an absurdly angular ballad that stretches into a gorgeous epic of dueling feedback and guitar lines.

"Dripping Dream" is the kind of song that could only have been written by frontman Thurston Moore.

"Paper Cup Exit" is the staple Lee Ranaldo track. It is a sharp song with a mix of noise and melody.

One of the most interesting tracks on "Sonic Nurse" is "Peace Attack," the mellow anti-Bush protest song. Much like the song "Youth Against Fascism" off of "Dirty," Sonic Youth is making clear their disdain for the actions of both presidents Bush.

"Sonic Nurse" is Sonic Youth's best album in terms of balance between pop melodies and avant structure since "Washing Machine." With "Sonic Nurse," Sonic Youth sounds fresh and ready to define cool for yet another generation.

VV2 album striking

Daniel Dumile has been busy. Within the past year he has released three critically acclaimed albums under three different personas, including this year's "Madvillainy," a collaboration with the beat maker Madlib. For those of you who don't know, Dumile is Zev Love X from the New York rap group KMD.

He eventually split and created the alter-ego MF (Metal Face) Doom, patterned after Marvel comic's Dr. Doom. Dumile recently introduced the public to King Geedorah and Viktor Vaughn.

Last year, Viktor Vaughn's first album, "Vaudeville Villain," was one of the best hip-hop albums of the year, commercial or underground.

Viktor is now back on Insomniac records with "(VV2): Venomous Villain."

While much better than anything commercially released as hip-hop today, it cannot stack up to previous releases under the MF Doom persona, especially "Madvillainy," and last year's "Vaudeville Villain." For one, the short album is slightly more than 33 minutes long.

The production is second-to-none in creating a dark, grimy-feeling record perfect for long walks in the rain with your headphones on and your hood up.

While Dumile has proven in the past that brevity can produce great hip-hop albums, the main flaw of this album is that Viktor is not on the mic enough.

Of the 12 tracks on the album, four are interludes, and during the rest of the album, Viktor only raps about one-third of the time.

As a matter of fact, this album almost feels like an Insomniac Records sampler featuring Viktor Vaughn.

However, the guest rappers do hold their own against Viktor's rhymes. The definite highlights of the album are "R.A.P. G.A.M.E." featuring Manchild and Iz-Real, a commentary about the decaying nature of commercial hip-hop, and "Doper Skiller," featuring underground rap legend Kool Keith.

Had the album been a little more fleshed out with tracks rivaling these, the album would have been one of the best hip-hop albums this year, as well as one of MF Doom's strongest releases.

This is not to say that this is a bad album.

The production is second-to-none in creating a dark, grimy-feeling record perfect for long walks in the rain with your headphones on and your hood up.

Who knew? Sex info online

If you've got a serious question about oral sex, you can't exactly type "oral sex" into Google and expect to find a reputable site that will provide accurate information.

There are Web sites for those who are seeking answers about all aspects of sex and sexuality.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention Web site might not be the sexiest site on the Web, but it does provide statistics concerning sexually transmitted diseases, pregnancy, sexual assault and a variety of reproductive health issues.

For example, you can access the 2002 Chlamydia rates for the state of Kansas in an easy-to-read chart format. There were more than 400 cases of Chlamydia per 100,000 women for that year.

Because the rates have been slowing climbing during the past seven years, you can expect this year's rate to be a bit higher.

The good news is syphilis rates have plummeted since 1990. Only 10 counties in Kansas reported any cases of syphilis in 2002. The bad news is Riley and Geary counties were two of them.

If you don't know what Chlamydia or syphilis are, medical information Web sites such as www.drkoop.com provide basic information as well as recent news items.

"Chlamydia infection is caused by the organism Chlamydia trachomatis. It is the most common sexually transmitted disease in the United States. Sexually active individuals and individuals with multiple partners are at highest risk," according to www.drkoop.com.

Chlamydia can be asymptomatic, meaning there will be no burning or other signs of infection, and if left untreated it can lead to Pelvic Inflammatory Disease and infertility in women.

Information about syphilis, including photos, is available through the Web site for the Discovery Health Channel.

"Primary syphilis can cause one or more painless ulcers, or sores, at the point where the bacteria entered the body. These sores are usually on the genitals.

"They may also be found around the anus, in the rectum or vagina, on the lips, and in the mouth," according to the Web site. Syphilis can cause a variety of ills including weakness, hair loss, seizures, blindness and even death.

There are Web sites that sell herbal concoctions that claim to enhance sexual performance. Buyer and reader beware of information that sounds too good to be true or products that promise results that appear superhuman.

Kilborn Calls it Quits

Craig Kilborn has decided to quit CBS' "Late Late Show" after five seasons, leaving the network to find a new host for the hour that follows "Late Show with David Letterman."

"It was easily the greatest job I've had, and CBS was very generous in their offer to re-sign me," Kilborn told Daily Variety. "But I simply want to try something new. I can now focus on writing and producing different television projects I haven't had time for."

Kilborn had drawn solid ratings for CBS since he took the time slot over from Tom Snyder.

There has been speculation as to who will replace Kilborn, but CBS, which learned of Kilborn's decision Thursday, had no comment on his replacement.

Donations sought for K-12 students in need

By Annette Lawless
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Shoppers at Manhattan Town Center now can get more from their shopping experience than stylish looks and huge credit card debt.

Stuff the Bus, a program sponsored by Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 and Manhattan Town Center, aims to help K-12 students who cannot afford school supplies, said Sara Van Allen, marketing manager at Manhattan Town Center.

"Kids are socially pressured to have the best clothes and the coolest backpacks," said Michele Jones, communications coordinator for USD 383. "This is our second year of operation. I know we can help lift off that pressure," she said.

Jones said nearly 28 percent of USD 383 students qualify for free or reduced meal prices.

"If they cannot afford their school lunches, they probably cannot afford school supplies."

Van Allen said the program plays an important role in making the school experience easier for students.

"The program asks the community to donate school supplies, from backpacks to note pads," Van Allen said. "It's an easy way for the Manhattan area to make a contribution to those who need help. But school supplies are not the only items accepted, clothing is accepted too."

Sponsors have been running the program since Aug. 11, and they plan to run it until Aug. 31.

"There is a lot of progress with the program," Van Allen said, "but we are still in need of supplies."

Van Allen said even though the plan was to end it on Aug. 31, they would keep it running as long as necessary. Once the program ends, schools will distribute the items throughout the district.

"If the school bus is not stuffed by Aug. 31, the program will run until we accomplish that goal," she said.

She said the Manhattan Town Center also sponsors another event called "Grands for Grade School."

"Basically, people donate receipts toward a particular Manhattan school, then that school earns points," Van Allen said. "Every dollar on a receipt equals a point. The school with the most points earns a $1,000 prize."

Sept. 11 commissioners attempt to curb distribution of fake IDs

By Leslie Miller
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Washington, D.C. — Sept. 11 commissioners told Congress on Monday they want the federal government to set standards for getting driver's licenses to make it harder for terrorists to fake their identities.

Commission Chairman Thomas Kean told the Senate Commerce Committee that ID cards helped terrorists prepare for the Sept. 11 hijackings by allowing them to board commercial flights.

"The time at which terrorists are most vulnerable is when they move around," Kean told the committee.

The Sept. 11 report issued last month said the United States must expand its border security system into a larger network of screening points, including places where people enter the transportation system or other possible targets, such as nuclear reactors.

Amtrak and the airlines already check passengers' IDs before they board.

The commission recommended the federal government issue standards for other forms of identification, such as birth certificates.

"Sources of identification are the last opportunity to ensure that people are who they say they are and to check whether they are terrorists," the report said.

Committee Chairman John McCain, R-Ariz., who said he would file bills to implement the commission's recommendations, indicated he was interested in a national ID card.

"Isn't that a fundamental issue we're going to have to address as a nation?" McCain asked Kean and Commission Vice Chairman Lee Hamilton, who also testified.

The American Civil Liberties Union says a standard driver's license would lead to a national database that would allow the government to keep track of where people go.

"We're objecting to the nationalization of the driver's license and databases that are going to have to be implemented in order to track driver's licenses," said Marvin Johnson, legislative counsel for the ACLU.

Hamilton said federal standards for issuing driver's licenses could lead to a national identification card, but people might accept it.

"The American public is becoming more and more agreeable to intrusiveness in order to protect themselves from a terrorist attack," Hamilton said.

Homeland Security Undersecretary Asa Hutchinson told the panel he didn't read any Sept. 11 commission recommendations he disagreed with, but didn't explicitly say he supported federal standards for driver's licenses.

Some states have already tightened requirements for getting a driver's license in order to screen out people who try to fake their identities and people who try to hide bad driving records.

Jason King, spokesman for the American Association of Motor Vehicle Administrators, said the group wants states to accept a standard set of credentials before issuing a driver's license.

"We must upgrade the practices," said King, whose group represents U.S. and Canadian departments of motor vehicles and highway law enforcement organizations.

King said the ACLU's fears are overblown. "A driver's license is issued independently by a state government, it has its own unique look and it's a voluntary credential. You're welcome to use a military ID or even a passport."

Cheye Calvo, transportation committee director for the National Conference of State Legislators, said the states are discussing establishing minimum standards on their own.

"The states have real problems with the federal government coming down with a hard-line single way," Calvo said.

Downtown area renovation project under way for city

By Annette Lawless
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Major theme parks and huge athletic fields are usually not the first thoughts that come to mind when thinking of Manhattan, Kan.

But soon they might be. The City of Manhattan has started preparing for landmark changes in the downtown area during the past few years said Jason Hilgers, assistant city manager and downtown redevelopment coordinator. Hilgers said city planners hope these changes that could put Manhattan on the map.

"On Aug. 31, the city commission invites residents to join them in a discussion revolving around attraction-based programming for the downtown redevelopment," Hilgers said.

"The meeting includes discussion over business centers and a potential Prairie Discovery Center."

He said the discovery center is something the city hopes will play a major role in the redevelopment of the downtown area.

"We want to become an affiliate with the Smithsonian," said Hilgers. "A move like this can bring a lot more to the city."

Everett said the concept is awaiting more concrete funding.

"Now, all Manhattan is waiting for is the money behind the plans—STAR bonds," said Manhattan Mayor Brad Everett.

Hilgers said the situation was complicated further earlier this summer.

"In July, the Kansas legislature passed a law restricting where STAR bond money can be spent," he said. "We have to adjust to the law, but we have been well aware of it for some time."

Everett said despite the change in law, the city commission plans to go ahead with the application.

"Once the city commission reviews the application on August 31, the proposal will be passed on to the state," Everett said. "After that, the state legislature will decide how much money Manhattan's project will receive."

Everett said following that process, the city will work with Dial Realty on development plans for the property, as well as finalize land purchases in the area and recruit companies to take part in the development.

Brian Waddell, manager and partner of Browns Shoe Fit Co., 311 Poyntz Ave., said he is eagerly preparing for changes in the downtown area.

"We have been changing the format of our store to prepare for the major changes that are to come," Waddell said. "We are excited about the change."

Everett said downtown businesses struggle to compete with major corporations and attractions like Wal-Mart and the Manhattan Town Center. Still, the area has a lot to offer, Waddell said.

"We have more to offer than students think," Waddell said. "You will see the college students drive right past this area, ignoring our businesses and heading straight to the mall. It definitely hurts our business."

Through the redevelopment, Everett said those businesses should benefit a great deal.

"We want to add more to the downtown area that will attract college students and people outside the Manhattan area," he said. "We are working our magic, and hopefully, things will soon fall into place."

Voters keep Chavez in office

By Alexandra Olson
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CARACAS, Venezuela — Venezuelans overwhelmingly voted to keep President Hugo Chavez in office, dealing a crushing defeat to a splintered opposition and allowing the leftist leader to convert one of the biggest challenges of his presidency into an even broader mandate to carry on his "revolution for the poor."

Stunned opposition leaders, who have fought for years to oust Chavez, claimed fraud after results announced Monday by election officials showed nearly 60 percent of voters had said "no" to the question of whether he should leave office immediately.

But former President Jimmy Carter and the Organization of American States endorsed the results of Sunday's vote, which saw one of the biggest turnouts in Venezuela's history, and urged everybody to accept the outcome.

"Now it's the responsibility of all Venezuelans to accept the results and work together for the future," Carter said.

Chavez's victory underscored the resilience of a leftist firebrand who has bluntly challenged "imperialist" U.S. foreign policies and cozied up to Cuban President Fidel Castro.

"Hopefully, from this day on Washington will respect the government and the people of Venezuela," Chavez proclaimed, speaking from a balcony at the presidential palace to thousands of supporters celebrating under a light rain.

Polling stations stayed open past midnight as millions of voters waited up to 12 hours in lines that snaked for several street blocks. Carter said it was the biggest turnout of any election he has monitored, estimating almost 10 million citizens voted in the oil-rich South American country of 24 million.

A 62-year-old woman died and four others were wounded after a group of apparently pro-Chavez motorcyclists fired into a small opposition protest in a Caracas plaza, said Caracas Fire Chief Rodolfo Briceno. Opposition lawmaker Ernesto Alvarenga was among those hurt, Briceno said.

Chavez, who is seen as a hero by Venezuela's majority poor but as authoritarian by his critics, particularly among the wealthy, vowed to continue his "revolution for the poor."

"Venezuela has changed forever," the 50-year-old former paratrooper declared. "There is no turning back."

Music department set for fall performances

Public concerts, recitals give students chance to showcase musical talents to campus, city

By Elena McVicar
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Department of Music is preparing up for its upcoming season of performances.

Concerts, recitals and operas are performed in various places and most are free, said Paul Hunt, department head.

"The faculty uses their performance capabilities to teach students how to perform," he said. "They also use their performances as research."

Students in the department, mainly juniors and seniors, give recitals as their music project. This is required for them to graduate, Hunt said.

These recitals require much preparation time.

"It has taken their whole lifetime to learn how to play the instrument," Hunt said. "However, it takes a month or two to prepare for certain recitals and concerts."

Carolyn Pirtle, graduate student in music, needed to give two recitals as a performance major.

"It's always a good learning experience to get up and perform in front of people," she said.

"Getting started is the hardest part, but once you get into it, you kind of get lost in the music itself."

Along with faculty and student recitals, the choir groups also give first-rate performances.

The Men and Women's Glee Clubs have strong traditions with the university, said music professor Gerald Polich.

"Getting started is the hardest part, but once you get into it, you kind of get lost in the music itself."

Carolyn Pitt
GRADUATE STUDENT IN MUSIC

For the past 37 years, Glee Club has performed along with the University of Nebraska before the K-State-Nebraska football game, he said.

However, many of the students in the Glee Clubs and K-State Singers, another student choir group, are not music majors.

"They participated in choir in high school and wanted to continue for fun in college," Polich said. "Music is a lifetime skill."

One such student is Shane Thoreson, junior in kinesiology.

"I've participated in Singers since my freshman year," Thoreson said.

Participating in Singers is very time-consuming, he said.

"We practice five days a week for two hours at a time," Thoreson said. "Last year we put on 30 shows."

"It takes up a lot of class time, because we have to travel to perform these shows, but when you see the audience's smiles it's all worth it."

Iran urges U.N. to help cease fighting in Iraq

By Ali Akbar Dareini
ASSOCIATED PRESS

TEHRAN, Iran — Iran and Saudi Arabia called Monday for the United Nations to intervene in Iraq to stop the fighting between U.S. forces and Shiite militants hiding in the holy city of Najaf.

Iranian Foreign Minister Kamal Kharrazi made the request in a telephone conversation with U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, the official Islamic Republic News Agency reported Monday.

"Americans once again made a grave blunder in calculating developments in Iraq and provoked the sentiments of the Iraqi people through resorting to the use of force," IRNA quoted Kharrazi telling Annan.

The Saudi Cabinet issued a statement expressing "deep pain and sorrow" over the situation in parts of Iraq and calling for "a greater role for the United Nations in efforts to stop the bloodshed," the official Saudi Press Agency reported.

Radical Iraqi Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr and his followers have fought U.S. and Iraqi forces from within the compound of the Imam Ali mosque in Najaf, in central Iraq, for over a week.

Sunday U.S. forces launched a new offensive against the militants in the mosque, the burial place of the Prophet Muhammad's cousin and son-in-law, who is revered by Shiites.

Predominantly Shiite Iran is keenly interested in the security of the holy sites. It also has links to Iraq's Shiite majority, and Iraqi officials have accused Tehran of meddling in the country's politics, a charge Iran denies.

Meanwhile, Iranian government spokesman Abdollah Ramezanzadeh said Tehran holds the interim Iraqi government responsible for the safety of an Iranian diplomat kidnapped in Baghdad.

A militant group holding Iranian diplomat Faridoun Jihani has said it would release him if Iran frees 500 Iraqi prisoners it is holding, but Tehran has rejected the conditions, saying there were no Iraqi prisoners in Iran.

"We hold the Iraqi interim government responsible for the safety of the diplomat," Ramezanzadeh told reporters Monday.

According to the Arab television station Al-Jazeera, the kidnappers — who say they belong to a group calling itself the Islamic Army of Iraq — has threatened to "punish" the diplomat but hasn't specified how.

Jihani, the Iranian consul to the Iraqi city of Karbala, was kidnapped while traveling from Baghdad to Karbala, 50 miles south of the capital last week.

Scores of other foreigners have been kidnapped as leverage to force foreign troops and businesses from the country.

There has been tension between Iraq and Iran in recent weeks. Last month, Iraqi Defense Minister Hazem Shaalan said Iran was Iraq's "first enemy" because it was playing a role in the insurgency. Iraqi Prime Minister Ayad Allawi later distanced his government from the remark.

Ramezanzadeh said such hostile comments resembled the language used by the toppled Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein.

Iran, a Shiite Muslim country with close ties to Iraq's majority Shiite population, is suspected of using money to influence the political field in Iraq.

The Iranian government has denied interfering in Iraq. It says it does not allow fighters to cross into Iraq, but it does not rule out that such people might cross the long border illegally.

Archaeologists uncover Biblical-era cave

By Karin Laub
ASSOCIATED PRESS

KIBBUTZ TZUBA, Israel — Archaeologists think they've found a cave where John the Baptist baptized many of his followers — basing their theory on thousands of shards from ritual jugs, a stone used for foot cleansing and wall carvings telling the story of the biblical preacher.

Only a few artifacts linked to New Testament figures have ever been found in the Holy Land, and the cave is potentially a major discovery in biblical archaeology.

"John the Baptist, who was just a figure from the Gospels, now comes to life," British archaeologist Shimon Gibson said during an exclusive tour of the cave given to the Associated Press.

But some scholars said Gibson's finds aren't enough to support his theory, and one colleague said short of an inscription with John's name in the cave, there could never be conclusive proof of his presence there.

John, a distant relative of Jesus — their mothers were kin, according to the Bible — was a fiery preacher with a message of repentance and a considerable following.

Tradition says he was born in the village of Ein Kerem, which today is part of modern Jerusalem. Just 2.5 miles away, on the land of Kibbutz Tzuba, a communal farm, the cave lies hidden in a limestone hill — 24 yards long, four yards deep and four yards wide.

It was carved by the Israelites in the Iron Age, sometime between 800 B.C. and 500 B.C., the scientists said. It apparently was used from the start as a ritual immersion pool, preceding the Jewish tradition of the ritual bath.

Over the centuries, the cave filled with mud and sediment, leaving only a tiny opening that was hidden by trees and bushes. Yet in recent years, it had occasional visitors — Reuven Kalifon, an immigrant from Cleveland who teaches Hebrew at the kibbutz, took his students spelunking.

They would crawl through the narrow slit at the mouth of the cave, all the way to the back wall, though they saw nothing but dirt and walls. In December 1999, Kalifon asked Gibson, a friend, to take a closer look.

Gibson, who has excavated in the Holy Land for more than 30 years, moved a few boulders near the walls and laid bare a crude carving of a head. Excited, he organized a full-fledged excavation.

Over the next five years, Gibson and his team, including volunteers from the University of North Carolina at Charlotte, cleared out layers of soil, picking up about 250,000 shards from small jugs apparently used in purification rituals.

The explorers uncovered 28 steps leading to the bottom of the cave. On the right, a niche is carved into the wall — typical of those used in Jewish ritual baths for discarding the clothes before immersion. Near the end of the stairs, the team found an oval stone with a foot-shaped indentation, — about a shoe size 11. Just above, a soapdish-like niche apparently held ritual oil that would flow through a small channel onto the believer's right foot.

On the water-covered floor of the cave, stones and boulders were moved aside by the worshippers and a middle path was filled with gravel, said Egon Lass, an archaeological consultant at Wheaton College, near Chicago, who also worked on the dig.

Crude images were carved on the walls, near the ceiling, and Gibson said they tell the story of John's life.

One is the figure of the man Gibson spotted on his first visit to the cave. The man appears to have an unruly head of hair and wears a tunic with dots, apparently meant to suggest an animal hide.

James Tabor, a Bible scholar from the University of North Carolina, said there is little doubt this is John himself. The Gospels say that John was a member of the Nazirites, a sect whose followers didn't cut their hair, and that he adopted the dress of the ancient prophets.

On the opposite wall is a carving of a face that could be meant to symbolize John's severed head. The preacher had his head cut off by Herod Antipas after he dared take the ruler to task over an illicit affair.

Bush plans realignment

Military restructure overseas will bring soldiers home soon

By Matt Kelley
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Washington, D.C. — President Bush's plan to restructure U.S. military forces abroad includes bringing two Army divisions home from Cold War-era bases in Germany, and increasing the U.S. presence at bases in countries like Poland, Romania and Uzbekistan, Pentagon officials said Monday.

Bush said the realignment would bring up to 70,000 troops — and about 100,000 family members and civilian workers — back to the United States within a decade. More than 200,000 U.S. troops are now stationed overseas, a majority of them in Europe.

Pentagon officials said the realignment also would close scores of U.S. military installations in Europe to consolidate forces at larger bases. At the same time, the United States would make greater use of training and logistics bases on the soil of its new allies, said three top Pentagon officials who briefed reporters on condition of anonymity.

The moves are meant to give the military greater flexibility and a quicker reaction time to deal with the smaller military engagements that Pentagon planners foresee during the war on terrorism and beyond.

Democratic critics said Bush's plan would place more troops further from potential battlefields and wear out soldiers with more frequent training overseas, away from families.

Retired Gen. Wesley Clark, a former Democratic presidential candidate, said Bush's plan "will significantly undermine U.S. national security."

Democratic presidential nominee John Kerry was asked by reporters for his reaction to Bush's move as he finished a bike ride near his family's retreat in Ketchum, Idaho. He replied: "It's a great day for a ride. Fabulous." He said later he had not seen the president's televised address.

In Germany, the two heavy armored divisions will be replaced with one brigade, a unit roughly one-third the size of a division's 15,000 or so troops. Instead of tanks, the replacement unit will be outfitted with new Stryker vehicles, the smaller, lighter and faster armored vehicles that are a key part of the Army's future strategy.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and other administration officials frequently have discussed the realignment with allies. Rumsfeld, who proposed the changes before the 2001 terrorist attacks, reassured Kremlin officials over the weekend in Russia that the U.S. moves into former Soviet and Warsaw Pact territory are not a threat to Moscow.

The United States has had about 1,000 soldiers in Uzbekistan ever since the war in neighboring Afghanistan after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. It has no soldiers permanently based in Poland and Romania, although it conducts some training exercises with those countries.

The changes would not directly affect the 150,000 troops involved in or supporting wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Both divisions based in Germany have seen action in Iraq, where the U.S. military presence increasingly relies on National Guard and Reserve forces.

Some German officials were dismayed at the troop shifts, which would cause multimillion-dollar holes in economies near U.S. bases.

"Base closures would hit us very hard," said spokesman Ole Kruse in the city of Wuerzburg, home of the 1st Infantry Division.

Underscoring the delicate balancing of military needs and diplomatic maneuvering, Bush administration officials offered few details of the realignment plans Monday and did so only on condition of anonymity. They said any major shifts would not begin until at least 2006 and possibly later.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said the three Defense Department officials and one State Department official who briefed dozens of reporters at a Pentagon news conference had to remain anonymous. The officials involved are all closely involved in the planning and negotiating involved.

The officials said the United States planned no new, major overseas bases. Poland has offered several bases for training, and U.S. officials are talking with Turkish officials about using the Incirlik air base, where allied planes patrolling the former "no-fly zone" over northern Iraq were based.

The U.S. officials refused to discuss plans for troop shifts in Asia. U.S. and South Korean officials previously said about one-third of the 37,000 American forces in South Korea will soon leave.

The United States and Japan are discussing possible changes for the more than 40,000 troops in Japan, but the officials would not say whether that involved increasing or decreasing the number.

Bush announced the plans in a speech to a Veterans of Foreign Wars convention in Ohio, a state he wants to win in November. Bush cast the shift as both a way to make the military more flexible and to give troops and their families more stability.

"Our service members will have more time on the home front, and more predictability and fewer moves over a career," Bush said.

However, stepped-up use of training bases overseas could mean more short-term rotations for troops as their families remain in the United States. And some U.S. civilian and contract workers at shuttered European bases would lose their jobs, the Pentagon officials said.

Office offers advice for student tenants

By Ashley Friesen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When looking for legal advice, K-State has free options.

The Students' Attorney Office and the Office of Consumer and Tenant Affairs are just a few of the amenities K-State offers to students through the Office of Student Activities and Social Services, located on the first floor of the Kansas Student Union.

The program for student legal services and the position for students' attorney was founded almost 30 years ago.

"It was during the mid-70's when that position was established," Bill Muir, vice-president for education advancement, said. "It was a little more of a populist era, and they thought free legal service was something students needed."

Students' attorney, Sarah Barr, graduated from Washburn University, School of Law in 1985 and since has worked in various areas of law, including a private practice and education. She also was in charge of a residence hall after finishing her bachelor's degree at Fort Hays State University.

Barr offers legal advice for free and litigates various types of cases for students.

"I see a lot of misdemeanor and small claims court cases, fake ID's, DUI's, wrongfully charged credit cards," Barr said.

Although Barr is qualified to try cases in court, she limits the number of cases that require litigation and focuses more on being a counselor at law.

"Because of time constraints, I try to not go to court except on rare occasions. I usually try to get students set up to handle it themselves without an attorney," Barr said. "I can't do a jury trial, obviously, because of time and staff constraints."

If she is unable to help a student, Barr said she considers it an obligation to advise a student in the right direction.

"If I can't help a student because it's a felony bank, I try to give them some general knowledge. Second, I try to help them find a lawyer, help them to decide whether or not they need one," she said. "I try to let them leave my office with some sense of direction."

Working alongside Barr is the staff in the Consumer and Tenant Affairs office.

"We offer assistance regarding landlord issues. Most of my clients are students who have rented from around town and have questions about property, lease and landlord issues," said CTA director Russell Fulmer.

The office handles a number of cases, including lease termination, failed landlord promises, security deposits and sanitary issues.

The CTA staff works closely with the student's attorney on several matters in order to better serve the students.

"We consult and collaborate on several issues. Matters that are directly consumer and tenant affairs related are directed to me," Fulmer said. "We consult about the grey matters in the Kansas Residential Landlord and Tenant Act."

The services offered by CTA and the students' attorney are free to registered K-State students. The program is funded by the student privilege fee.

"It comes out of my office budget, OSAS, which is funded by privilege fees," said Gayle Spencer, assistant dean of student life. "Every student pays for her salary."

Al-Qaeda expert met with suspects, officials say

By Matthew Pennington
ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — A senior al-Qaeda operative captured in Britain this month had traveled in March to a militant hideout near the Pakistan-Afghan border and met with other terror suspects, officials said Monday.

But Pakistan's army spokesman dismissed a report that the meeting — alleged to have taken place around the time a major military offensive was launched against al-Qaeda fugitives — plotted new attacks on the United States.

Abu Eisa al-Hindi, accompanied by an explosives expert, secretly visited the Pakistani tribal region of South Waziristan in March before "discreetly going back to London," said the spokesman, Maj. Gen. Shaikat Sultan. He did not identify the explosives expert.

The spokesman said Pakistan got the information about the visit of al-Hindi, a British citizen, from Mohammed Naem Noor Khan, an alleged al-Qaeda computer engineer who met with al-Hindi. Khan, a Pakistani, was captured by Pakistani intelligence agents on July 13 in the eastern city of Lahore.

His capture triggered a wave of arrests. Interior Minister Faisal Saleh Hayyat said Monday that in the past four weeks, authorities have arrested 51 Pakistanis and 12 foreigners for involvement in various acts of terrorism.

Among the foreigners was Ahmad Khalfan Ghailani — a Tanzanian wanted for the 1998 bombings of two U.S. embassies in east Africa that killed more than 200 people — who was arrested on July 25 in eastern Pakistan. Some Pakistanis involved in last year's two failed assassination attempts against President

Gen. Pervez Musharraf and last month's suicide attack on prime minister-designate Shaikat Aziz have also been arrested, Hayyat said. Aziz escaped unharmed, but nine people were killed when a suicide bomber blew himself up in the town of Fateh Jang.

Information from Khan was also shared with Britain, leading to the arrest of al-Hindi and 12 other suspects on Aug. 3.

Al-Hindi is a veteran of the Islamic militant struggle against Indian forces in Kashmir. He is also reported to have worked as an instructor at al-Qaeda camps in Afghanistan before the fall of the Taliban regime in late 2001.

He is suspected of authoring surveillance documents recovered from Khan and Ghailani's computers of five financial buildings in the United States. The computers contained photographs, maps and plans of Heathrow airport and other potential terrorist targets in Britain.

The unearthing of this intelligence prompted the United States to declare a terror alert. Although the surveillance of the U.S. financial institutions appeared to date back as far as 2000, the Bush administration said it was another sign al-Qaeda might be planning attacks.

Time magazine reported on its Web site Sunday that al-Hindi held a "terrorist summit" in South Waziristan in March with other al-Qaeda operatives — including an American of Pakistani descent, Mohammed Junaid Babar, who was arrested in New York in April and linked to a terrorism plot in Britain.

The report cited unidentified U.S. officials as saying they feared the meeting could have been a planning session for attacks on the United States. It quoted Musharraf, a key ally in the U.S.-led war on terrorism, as saying the meeting was "extremely significant."

Yes, the students are back in town.

They're also spending money to furnish their living spaces.

They're shopping in the Kansas State Collegian classifieds.

SHUTTLE | Local church offers additional transportation option

The shuttle is funded by the Global Education Initiative that passed in February 2003.

Cook said the $70,000 initiative allocated money for the Office of International Programs to fund a graduate assistant, scholarships for students who are going abroad and transportation.

About $10,000 is set aside for transportation, she said.

The shuttle runs Saturday mornings and makes two stops — one at Jardine and the other at the K-State Student Union.

From there the shuttle takes the students to Wal-Mart Supercenter so they can shop for groceries and other essentials.

The shuttle then drops the students off at their homes, so they don't have to carry their bags far, Thacker said.

Cook said she thinks the shuttle program helps the international students feel welcome.

"This is a need that has been felt around this office for years, and there was no way to do anything about it until we got that money," she said.

Students needing to bring their spouses or children do have another option.

Victory Campus Ministries offers a shuttle for international students on Saturdays also.

Bekki Diefendorf, shuttle coordinator for Victory Campus Ministries, said they allow students to bring along their families if necessary.

"They do need to e-mail us and reserve a seat if they would like to go," she said.

"The only problem is that if their child needs a car seat, they need to bring it with them."

Keith Taylor, senior in mechanical engineering, volunteered to drive the shuttle last Saturday and said families were taking advantage of the program.

"I actually took one guy's father and another guy's wife," he said.

DROP POLICY | Practice stresses importance of 1st day of classes; professors require prior notification from absent students actually be an advocate for those students who wanted access to the class but were not allowed that access."

K-State would not be the first university of its kind to adopt such a practice. Stewart said some comparable institutions have a similar policy.

He said Senate also hoped to make students realize the first day of class is important.

"There has been the assumption that the first day of class is a time where you do only house-keeping matters," Stewart said. "That's not the case. Classes actually begin with the first meeting of the class and students do need to take that seriously."

Stewart said the policy didn't mean every student who missed the first day of a class would be automatically removed, just those students who were absent without notifying their professor beforehand would be subject to removal from the course.

"What (students) need to do is notify their instructor they will be missing the class but that they have every intention of continuing with the class," he said.

Stewart said not all instructors will follow the policy necessarily.

"At this point, it is stated policy as approved by the Faculty Senate. How instructors interpret that policy is, of course, up to the respective instructors," he said.

TENNIS | Freshmen step up to help improve team for coming season

"We have two freshmen that are here already, that are going to be a significant help to our program," he said.

Those two freshmen are Olga Klimova and Tereza Prochzkova. Both hail from the Czech Republic, and both are looking to contribute quickly to this year's team.

However, Prochzkova's status is in question because of recent knee surgery.

That leaves Klimova as the freshman who is looking at serious playing time this fall.

However, she said she is not deterred by any pressure that may fall on her shoulders.

Add into the mix senior Judith Diaz, and juniors Aven Alkhatib and Jessica Simosa, and the Wildcats have the look of an older, more experienced squad.

Bietau said he insists each year the players fight for six starting positions, and this year will be no different.

"We start every year the same way and nobody's position is guaranteed from the year before," he said.

"My expectation is they will play as well as they are capable of playing and let's sort out the lineup as the year goes on."

40th Fort Riley soldier killed in central Iraq

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Another Fort Riley soldier has been killed in Iraq.

Sgt. Daniel Michael Shepherd, 23, of Ohio was killed Sunday when his vehicle was hit by a homemade bomb near Ar Ramadi, said Sam Robinson, Fort Riley public affairs officer. The incident is under investigation.

He is survived by a wife and child. Shepherd was a member of the 1st Battalion, 16th Infantry Regiment of the 1st Brigade, 1st Infantry Division, which deployed to Iraq in September 2003.

His death brings the total killed in Iraq from Fort Riley to 40.

On Friday, Neil Santoriello, 24, was killed in Khalidiyah when a bomb exploded near his patrol.

He was a platoon leader for Company A, 1st Battalion, 34th Armor, 1st Brigade, 1st Infantry Division.

As of Tuesday, 935 U.S. soldiers have been killed in Iraq since March 2003.

U.S. warplane bombs Najaf

Explosions, gunfire in Baghdad kill 7, wound 35

By Jamie Tarabay
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — A U.S. warplane bombed Tuesday near Najaf's vast cemetery as fighting with Shiite militants intensified. An Iraqi delegation brought a peace proposal aimed at ending the standoff in the holy city, which has marred a Baghdad conference meant to be a landmark step toward democracy.

The National Conference was extended for another day to today as delegates sought to give the peace mission in Najaf a chance.

Violence in the capital also rattled the conference. A mortar round exploded on a central Baghdad street several miles away, killing seven people and wounding 35, according to the Health Ministry. Two other explosions, closer by, shook the conference center itself, slightly injuring at least two people.

Explosions and gunfire were heard in the streets of Najaf, 100 miles south of Baghdad, throughout the day, and U.S.

troops entered the flashpoint Old City neighborhood, the stronghold of fighters loyal to radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

At least one plane dropped bombs in the area of the cemetery, where al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia has been battling U.S. forces. It was not clear if the strike hit inside or near the sprawling necropolis.

The clashes Tuesday killed three people and wound 15 others, all of them civilians,

Leisurely luau

Jeremy Thornbrugh, senior in wildlife biology, tries to clear the bar during a limbo contest Tuesday night in front of Goodnow Hall. The event was designed to bring people together.

By Julie Mitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Supporting leis and listening to tunes like "Wipeout" and "Piña Colada," residents of Goodnow Hall were treated to a welcoming luau Tuesday.

"It's a great opportunity for us to build community and bring the residents together," Nic Kline, junior in business administration, said.

Staff served hot dogs, hamburgers and drinks to hungry residents as they mingled in Goodnow's front entrance.

"I came for the free food and the conversations," Scott

McSpadden, freshman in biology, said.

Jodi Dedrick, sophomore in animal science and industry, agreed.

"It's hot in the dorms, and this beats fast food," she said.

After eating, residents stayed for activities on the front lawn, including volleyball, frisbee and a limbo contest.

Jeremy Thornbrugh, senior in wildlife biology, was the unofficial winner, successfully squeezing underneath the foot-high limbo pole.

"I'm just a really flexible person," he said.

Carrie Overton, sophomore in open-option and vice president of Goodnow Hall, hands out leis during the cookout at Goodnow Hall. The event had a Hawaiian theme.

Bush's plan to affect troops

As many as 3,000 soldiers could return to Kansas

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Everyone keeps asking if Big Red One will return.

With President Bush's announcement of troop realignment, which will bring 70,000 soldiers home, the answer may come soon.

Pentagon officials indicated the 1st Infantry Division — Big Red One — would be one of those divisions making the move from Europe in 2006. The nickname refers to the arm patch displaying a green shield with a red No. 1.

Bringing the 3,000 soldiers of this division home to Kansas would reverse a 1996 decision that sent two brigades to Germany, cutting Fort Riley's force by 40 percent. The realignment would not begin until mid-2006 and continue through 2010.

However, all the talk of increased business, school population and traffic is just that — talk.

"We do not have any information that this would affect Fort Riley," said Sam Robinson, Fort Riley public affairs officer. "As far as we know, we know of no changes."

Military administration officials declined to provide details of the plan, including where the divisions would be relocated in the United States, according to the Associated Press.

At Rusty's Last Chance in Aggieville, business would most likely increase with the return of soldiers, according to some.

"It's mostly college students, but we get a fair amount of Fort Riley soldiers in here so it will definitely add to business," Jamie Stewart, bartender, said. "It would be a positive effect."

Randy Tholstrup, owner of Military Outlet in Junction City, told the Associated Press he was already determining what items he would have to keep in stock to accommodate the influx in business.

"It would be a good problem," he said.

LET'S DO THE TIME WARP

ANN ARBOR, Mich. — Students at the University of Michigan are celebrating the anniversary of the student union by replacing a time capsule that lies embedded within an entrance column to the building.

The time capsule, placed inside the column 50 years ago, will be opened in late October. Union officials are accepting ideas for what to place in the capsule for this year. Suggestions thus far have ranged from a computer to a beer bong.

The 1954 time capsule contained coins and photographs of the Union building itself.

TERROR ON CAMPUS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Students moving into residence halls on the campus of George Washington University are doing so after the university released a terrorism warning that named nearby buildings as potential targets.

The university announced this week that the cars of students are subject to random searches if they park near the residence halls; the potential target area spans about four blocks, police said. The measures were put into place after Homeland Security director Tom Ridge announced raised terror threat levels for Washington; Newark, N.J.; and New York City.

Most students will arrive on campus around Aug. 28.

DIVERSITY AT MIZZOU

COLUMBIA, Mo. — Minority enrollment at the University of Missouri is up this year, university representatives say.

University spokesman Christian Basi said ethnic minority freshmen figures are up 8.3 percent; enrollment of African-American students is up 6.1 percent compared to last fall, and Hispanic student enrollment has risen 8.4 percent as well.

Basi said MU began stepping up its recruitment of minority students in 1993 and that recruitment of ethnically diverse faculty is an issue the university will tackle next.

Neeley Kleen had to fan herself to keep cool Tuesday afternoon when she visited the K-State Student Union.

The Union, along with several other campus buildings, was without air conditioning Monday and Tuesday.

Ed Heptig, facilities maintenance director, said the outage was due to a 12,470-volt power line explosion.

"We had a main power line blow up that fed the chill plant," he said. "This prevented us from being able to send chill water throughout campus."

The explosion was the result of old wiring, Heptig said.

"The old line just couldn't take anymore," he said.

Heptig said the university's cooling system is similar to central air conditioning found in some homes.

"It works just like central air but instead of having a cooling unit outside, all of the cooling is done on a big system in the chill plant," he said. "The chilled water is then sent to the buildings to cool them down."

Kleen, a freshman in open option, said the temperatures in the Union were almost unbearable.

"It's just too hot in here," she said.

Jack Connaughton, associate director for the Union, said they spent between $500 to $600 to buy about 20 fans to help keep the building cool.

"It's been a challenge," he said. "These are two heavy days, as far as people moving back and getting ready for classes."

Connaughton said he suspects a lot of revenue has been lost because of the cooling problem.

"We've probably lost revenue in the food service area and in the bowling area, and I'm sure people aren't staying in the bookstore too long either," he said. "They will just get their books and go."

Although there is no estimate as to how much has been spent on maintenance, Heptig said he thought it would be quite a bit.

"We've had guys working around the clock on the problem, so we do have people working overtime," he said.

Police cite 9 for alcohol at Pillsbury

By Scott Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nine people were cited this weekend for alcohol violations at Pillsbury Crossing.

Andrea Scheuerman, 25, and Rhea Moore, 21, 1200 Bluemont, No. 1; Chad Simmons, 23, 1203 Laramie; and Dustin Kammerer, 23, 1206 Kearney, No. 3; were issued notices to appear for unlawful possession of alcohol in a state park during the weekend.

On Monday, Brandon Crichton and John Lawrence, 617 Laramie; Jennifer Tum-berger, 830 Harris; John Fox, 1205 Pomeroy; and Nathan Murdock, 1015 Denison, all 21, also were cited for the same offense.

Riley County Police Lt. Kurt Moldrup said the offenses are not uncommon.

"It's not unusual to see a lot of citations at Pillsbury," Moldrup said. "When one person is out there drinking, there is usually more."

He said officers routinely patrol the park, but the recent spike is likely due to an increase in the number of people going to the park rather than increased patrol.

"I don't know that these were all [K-State] students," he said. "Given their addresses and some other factors, that is my assumption."

According to the Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks' Web site, consumption of "cereal malt beverages containing no more than 3.2 percent alcohol is permitted on department lands and waters unless otherwise posted."

Moldrup said there is a sign at Pillsbury notifying visitors possession of alcohol is prohibited.

British police bring terrorism charges

By Robert Barr
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LONDON — British police charged eight men Tuesday with terrorist offenses, including one suspected al-Qaeda operative accused of having surveillance plans of financial institutions in New York, Washington and New Jersey at the center of a U.S. terror alert this month.

The men were arrested two weeks ago in a major sweep connected to raids in Pakistan and to Aug. 1 terror alerts in the United States, where officials warned that al-Qaeda had scoped out buildings as possible targets several years ago. A ninth man was charged with possession of a prohibited weapon.

In Washington, Attorney General John Ashcroft said federal authorities "will explore every aspect of this case" to determine whether to press charges in the United States. The FBI will still cooperate with British authorities, he said.

"We commend the United Kingdom's action today in bringing criminal charges against individuals who may have connections to potential terrorist activities in the United States," Ashcroft said.

The eight were due to make a first court appearance Wednesday at Belmarsh high security prison in London.

One suspect, Dhiren Barot, 32, was charged with possessing a reconnaissance plan of the Prudential Building in Newark, N.J., in violation of the Terrorism Act.

CITY OF MANHATTAN KANSAS

TO THE POINT Economy could benefit from Big Red One

The return of Fort Riley's Big Red One would be beneficial for many members of the Manhattan economy.

With President Bush's recent announcement of a plan to bring 70,000 troops home from Europe as early as 2006, the return of the 3,000-soldier division seems more of a possibility.

Manhattan businesses across the board likely would see an increase in customers, creating an economic boom the town needs.

Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 might find the solution to its dramatic annual decline in student population.

Although we can anticipate problems with housing, crime and traffic, there are solutions to these problems.

Fort Riley officials, as well as the Kansas Congressional delegation, should actively lobby for Big Red One's return.

With an already shaky economy that has plagued the town for some time, Manhattan could use the boost.

Technology creates headaches for online voters nationwide

SHANNA HAJEK

I don't know about everyone else's computers, but I'm starting to wonder if PC actually stands for "piece of crap."

My computer freezes up all the time, loads Web pages extremely slowly and sometimes refuses to shut down on its own, prompting me to unplug it while it's still on. In light of the problems I've encountered with my computer, I was dismayed when I found out that our country is moving towards computerized voting.

To people like me, who routinely have problems with their own computers, this seems like a relatively stupid idea.

How is it stupid? In computerized voting, voters go into a booth and select their chosen candidates on a touch-screen computer. This in itself seems as though it would be problem-prone. How many of those have you seen or used that don't work?

After the voter has finished, the results are routed to yet another computer and stored there, where it is tallied with all the other votes. Nowhere throughout this whole process is there a single scrap of paper to confirm your very important vote.

Since paper ballots were to blame for the voting debacle created in Florida in the 2000 presidential election, I can understand how some would want to revamp the voting procedure. But is completely relying on computers for the whole voting process the answer?

Florida and Texas have utilized computerized voting machines in recent elections. In each state, suspicious election results turned up:

2004 - In Broward County,

Fla., with one election on the ballot, computerized voting terminals failed to record a total of 134 votes. The race in question was won by only 12 votes.

2002 - In Comal County, Texas, three candidates won local seats, each with a total of exactly 18,181 votes. If that's a coincidence, it would be the mother of them all.

Due to the lack of a form of paper trail, none of the votes in either state could be verified.

However, what is even more disturbing is the fact that the upcoming presidential election promises to be a close one.

Since most of the state of Kansas is relatively rural, there are only a few counties currently utilizing the new voting technology. Riley County still uses the paper ballot system.

However, according to the Riley County Clerk's office, all of the United States should have computerized voting terminals by 2006.

There's very little that can be changed about the use of computerized voting terminals. But, if you're concerned with the accuracy of votes in the upcoming presidential election, there is something you can do.

MoveOn.org has a petition they will send to Congress, the White House and our state election officials.

The petition informs election officials of this concern and also asks that some kind of hard copy (a tally printout or voter receipt) be available for scrutiny if suspicious results do arise.

If computerized voting is used in your county, you can insist on filling out a paper ballot, which should be on hand in case of (inevitable) technical difficulties. It's your vote. It's your right to decide how you cast it.

It's not asking much. No one is asking that all of the new voting technology be thrown away - just that all votes can be readily verified. In the upcoming election, more than any other, I want my voice heard and my vote accounted for. Don't you?

Some aspects of college life best viewed with cynical eyes

LOGAN ADAMS

Dear Newcomers,
Hello little freshman. How are you? Are you adjusting well?

Oh, so you've moved into the little cell they keep trying to tell you is a "residence hall room," and you've adapted to your new environment. I bet you feel pretty proud of yourself now that you've found all your classrooms in advance and scouted out the best places to sit.

Why, you have might already gone so far as to label each of your notebooks for a particular class and sharpened each and every one of your pencils. You're just as prepared as prepared can be.

Or so you think, little one. Today is Wednesday, Aug. 18. The first day of the rest of your life, and the beginning of an experience all its own.

Now, you have might already taken a few credit hours at the community college. You might even have enough to be a second-semester freshman already. Don't let me rain on your parade, but those won't be of any help beyond what they've already provided.

Don't ever forget that you're not the only newbie here. Don't even try to use your cell phone after night minutes start each evening for the next couple weeks. So many little freaks try to call mommy and daddy every night to update them about how mean or nice or interesting or boring all their professors are that it becomes difficult at best to get a connection, let alone one that lasts more than a minute.

Still waiting to buy a cell phone at this point? When you do, remember that these wireless wonders sure look good at the stand, but they break easy. I've seen it happen to too many innocent people, including my sorry self. All they have to do is utter the words "free phone" and they've got you for the next two years. Beware the bearers of annoying ringers!

Don't get scared now; you've still got much to learn. I bet by now you've heard two dozen people use the exact same speech to explain to you the importance of attending class. Most parents go through the whole issue every time they find themselves with nothing else to talk to you about.

They always go on and on about how important it is to be there in the room to learn, about how you must keep those grades up and can learn everything so you get a good degree and go out into the world instead of moving back into their house after being expelled.

I'm not going to lecture you. I already know you simply will not care. I already know you're still going to skip classes because an extra hour of sleep or talking to this friend or watching "The Price is Right" always will look much, much more rewarding to you. I also already know that when you get your first semester grades back and your parents finally find them, you're going to reorganize your priorities rather immediately.

Did I just sneak a guilt trip in there? Shame on me. Moving on...

Now, if you want to spend more than four years here like more and more people are doing, go ahead. College shelters you from the real world. It's much more cuddly than working a real job and scrapping for everything you need in a real life.

However, if you've got plans for life, hopes and dreams, desires and needs, those sorts of things that you came here to prepare and equip yourself for (that's why you're here, isn't it?), then you might want to keep your mind in top gear and to the straight and narrow.

Finally, after all that negativity, cynicism and coldness, here's something fuzzy to latch onto: Don't be afraid. Fear not the boring tenured professor nor the sadistic graduate teaching assistant. Don't be intimidated into hiding in your room when you find campus to be too complex.

And above all, don't be afraid of the campus wildlife. Yes, the squirrels, birds and baby rabbits may seem ferocious at first, and they may be rumored to have eaten a few Classy Cats in the past, but you shouldn't let them get to you.

Unless they start helping you with your research papers - then you've got good reason to be frightened. You should know by now that animals suck at writing.

Sincerely,
Logan Adams

Education key to paper's quality

PATRICE R. HOLDERBACH

Reporters are not angels. Editors are not gods. Newspapers, like most things in life, are not perfect.

As hard as we try, we in the newsroom don't always get it right. When a major leadership conference did not receive the coverage its planners thought it deserved last spring, readers spoke up. Editors listened.

They revamped a beat system to better cover people and events. They improved a reader-editor feedback system. And this semester the Collegian enterprise team will be taking on complex issues that should be more thoroughly investigated and explained to readers.

The reader-reporter dialogue must continue. If the Collegian is to remain the collegiate mark of excellence for which it is respected throughout the nation, if it will serve and reflect the wide variety of readers that make up this campus, communication is critical, as is education.

The summer and fall Collegian editors have invited diversity speakers to visit with the Collegian staff throughout the semesters. And a readers' advocate is seeking reader feedback to be published on Tuesdays.

In June, Collegian editors offered a community-learning class called People's Press 101: An introduction to journalism and the newsroom. We poked fun at the media, debated the media, learned about the media and then became the media. Class participants researched, interviewed for and wrote stories of their own choosing. Both reader and editor learned something about the other.

This semester, opportunities abound to interact with the Collegian. Watch for information about the upcoming "Got Beef?" series, an opportunity for anyone in the community to voice their concerns about the media, government and other leadership organizations.

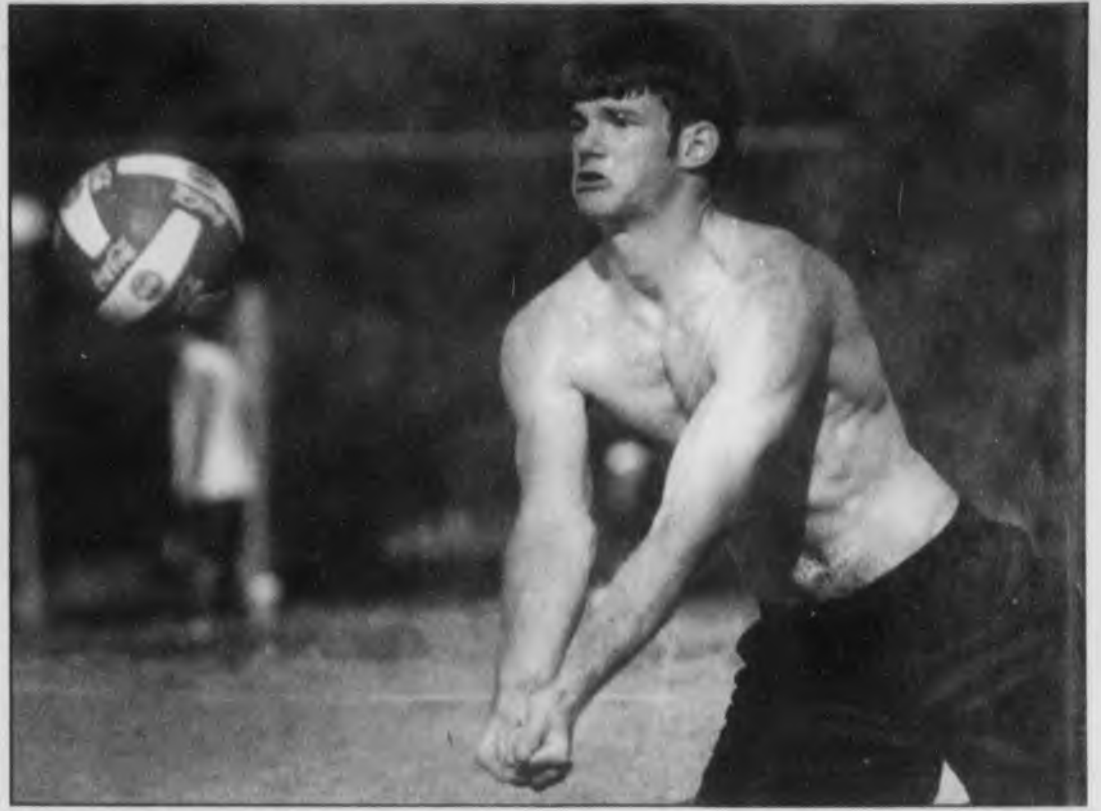

Meanwhile, feel free to call or stop by the newsroom anytime. Leave your thoughts with a call to the Campus Fourum, in a letter to the editor, or in an e-mail to me at collegn@spub.ksu.edu.

Bring me your stories; I enjoy hearing from the voices representing all parts of the globe.

Come visit the newsroom in Kedzie 116 and meet the journalists dedicated to ensuring there's a paper in the racks each morning — a daily tool to help readers make informed decisions about their lives.

The responsibility is huge and the honor great, but we need your feedback to make it work.

Fantasy league wide open

MATTHEW GIRARD

It's that time of year again – when football fans around the country try to show that arm-chair quarterbacks know more than the well-paid coaches in the National Football League by joining fantasy football leagues, and we at the Collegian are no different.

Our draft took place Sunday with assorted characters from around the newsroom and some other friends vying for the title of Collegian Power Football champion.

I took it upon myself to document our draft day with a running diary of events that took place.

Not an hour before the draft the complaining started.

"There are too many teams, and it isn't going to be competitive." "We need another player so there isn't a bye week." "I haven't pre-ranked my players yet."

Geez, my cat didn't whine this much when she was in heat, but let's get on to the draft.

Round one:

The draft order was randomly selected and I got stuck with the 14th pick overall.

I thought, "great, I set up the league and get everyone involved, and now I'm going to be the punching bag."

Clinton Portis was selected as our number-one pick of the draft, with LaDainian Tomlinson going second, Shaun Alexander third and Priest Holmes dropping to the fourth pick.

The first round was pretty predictable until the 13th pick, when one of our rookie sports writers (we'll call him "Meat") gave us our first "What the hell?!" moment of the draft. With his first pick, "Meat" selected former Wildcat Quincy Morgan of the Cleveland Browns.

With the final pick of the round, I was happy to take Donovan McNabb of the Philadelphia Eagles.

Round two:

The nice thing about being the last pick in the first round is being the first pick of the second round, and I figured I should get at least one good running back for my team.

I picked up Corey Dillon of the New England Patriots, but he would be the last decent running back I would come across the rest of the draft.

Rounds three through six brought many predictable picks with Tony Gonzalez, Brett Favre, Trent Green, Eddie George, Kellen Winslow and Ray Lewis.

During Round Six I took a chance on rookie wide receiver Larry Fitzgerald of the Arizona Cardinals.

Round Seven:

Probably the first steal of the draft happened when our fearless sports editor picked up quarterback Tom Brady and all of us let out expletives in unison.

During Round Eight the computer rankings really started to cause havoc.

The aforementioned last year's champ, "Genital Warts," picked up tight end Boo Williams of the New Orleans Saints. After the pick he exclaimed, "Who is that? What is he – a ghost?"

As rounds nine through 12 rolled on, our first trade came out of the woodworks, when "Summer's Eve" asked our sports editor if he wanted to trade Deuce Staley and Rich Gannon for Peyton Manning.

My first thought was how ridiculous the trade was, and our sports editor agreed saying, "Why would I ever do something like that?"

Rounds 13 through 16:

The computers made their presence known again when our sports editor's crashed and he was forced to rely on his pre-rankings. I, on the other hand, still was going strong and picked up a defensive steal with Julius Peppers of the Carolina Panthers in the 14th.

Rounds 17 through 24:

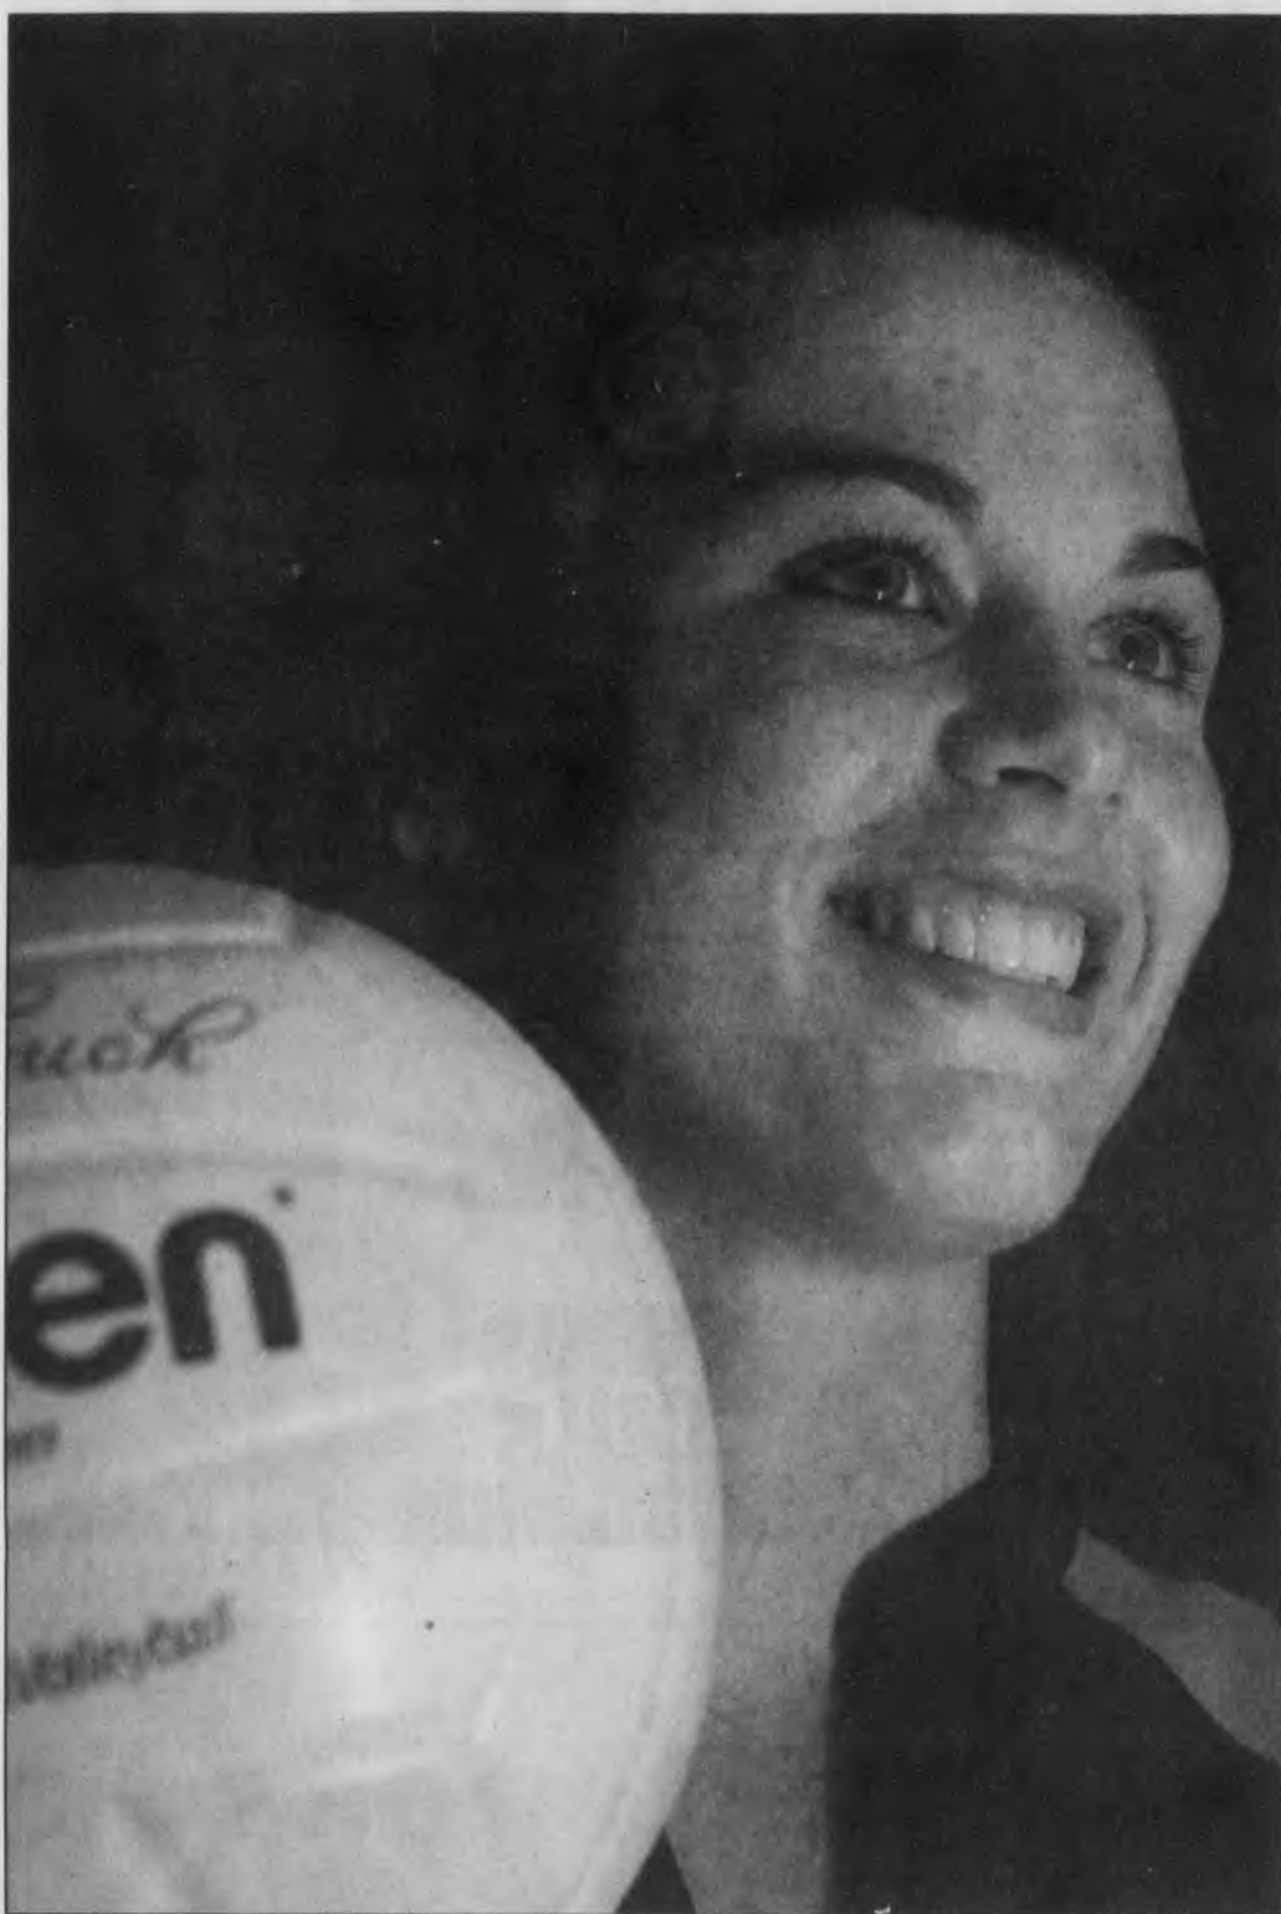

We reached the end of the madness, but not without a few more laughs.

The rankings for "Summer's Eve" took over and picked up defensive lineman Jacques Cesaire of San Diego in the 17th, causing him to exclaim, "Who lets French people play football?"

At the end of all this, I realized two things. Fourteen teams is probably way too many teams to have in a fantasy league, and I thoroughly will enjoy beating up on the likes of Summer's Eve and our sports editor.

Senior setter Gabby Guerre was named to the preseason All-Big 12 Team. Guerre has been a 3-year starter for the Wildcats and will serve as one of the captains this year.

Guerre readies to lead team to additional Big 12 wins

By Kent Hildebrand
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Calm, consistent and experienced – these are the words coaches and teammates use to describe senior setter Gabby Guerre.

Guerre, a 3-year starter and captain for the K-State women's volleyball team, was named to the preseason All-Big 12 team after a strong 2003 campaign that garnered her honorable mention All-America honors.

After that kind of success, she and the rest of the Wildcats are ready for 2004.

"We want to win the Big 12 again, that's probably our biggest goal," Guerre said. "We want to go far in the NCAA Tournament. The girls have worked so hard this summer, and everyone's been running and lifting. It's really exciting; I'm looking forward to it."

Guerre will have a pivotal role in helping the Wildcats attain those goals, said fellow senior outside hitter Valeria Hejjas.

"She touches the ball almost every time, so it's very important that she can do her job," Hejjas said. "She fills her spot as captain very well – she is a great leader. I'm very impressed with her ability as a setter and a hitter."

"She can stay really calm in the hardest situations. If the setter can stay calm, she is kind of the heart of the team," she said.

Coach Suzie Fritz said calmness is one part of what makes Guerre an outstanding player.

"Gabby has a nice demeanor for setting in that the highs aren't too high, and the lows aren't too low for her," she said. "If we're winning or losing, you wouldn't be able to tell with her. She provides a nice, consistent – yet strong – floor presence."

Guerre's experience and poise make her one of the most talented setters in the nation, Fritz said.

"I think she can do things offensively that no other setter in the country can do in terms of her ability to

As the defending Big 12 Conference champions, the women's volleyball team is striving for title number two in 2004.

Expectations are high for the Wildcats, who come into the year picked second in the Big 12 and ranked 14th in the nation.

"Our expectations for our program and our goals don't change from year to year in that we have very high goals – we want to be in contention for a Big 12 championship and compete nationally with the best teams in the country," Coach Suzie Fritz said. Tuesday, despite a second-round score five strokes lower than his first, former Wildcat golfer A.J. Elgert missed the cut at the U.S. Amateur at Winged Foot Golf Club in Mamaroneck, N.Y.

Elgert shot a three over par 73 in the second round, putting him at 11 over par for the tournament.

But when the last of the 312 players finished their rounds, the cut was placed at 10 over par, keeping the former K-State standout from making the field of 64 golfers who will compete in the match-play portion of the Amateur which concludes Sunday.

A third-team All-America as a senior last season, Elgert was a vital part of the Wildcats' fourth-place finish in the 2004 Big 12 Tournament — K-State's highest conference finish since 1968.

Mistakes keep American gymnasts from gold

The mistakes were so minor. Carly Patterson's foot scraping the lower of the uneven bars. Courtney Kupets' tumbling pass that ended here instead of there. Mohini Bhardwaj's slight stumble on the beam.

They're the kind of errors only judges see, little things that seem so inconsequential. But those mistakes add up, and they cost the U.S. gymnastics team a gold medal.

The Americans settled for silver Tuesday night, done in as much by their own sloppiness as Romania's sheer superiority.

Their errors in every event cost them valuable fractions of points. They finished with 113.584, just behind the Romanians.

Phelps bounces back with two gold medals

Now this was a duel in the pool – the world's two greatest swimming powers going head-to-head for more than seven minutes at the Olympics.

And it all came down to Klete Keller holding off Ian Thorpe and finishing off the Australians with a lunge for the wall that gave the Americans a gold medal in the 800-meter freestyle relay.

By 13-hundredths of a second.

With Michael Phelps leading off Tuesday night, the United States bested its rival from Down Under in the most thrilling race of the Athens Games. Phelps earned his third gold medal of the Olympics, having won the 200-meter butterfly about an hour earlier.

Halfway through the eight-day swimming meet, Phelps has three gold and two bronze medals.

He had hoped to challenge Spitz's record of seven gold medals from the 1972 Munich Games, but that effort ended with third-place finishes in the 400 free relay and 200 free.

Odom's clutch play helps U.S. basketball team edge Greece

Tim Duncan had fouled out, Allen Iverson was playing with a broken thumb, and Greece had a chance to pull within two points with 18 seconds left.

Lamar Odom defended the play perfectly for the Americans, keeping his hand high and preventing Dimitris Papanikolaou from getting a clean layup attempt.

Odom, playing despite severe dehydration, rebounded the miss and made two free throws to lock up the U.S. team's 77-71 victory Tuesday night in its second game of the Olympics.

In a much closer contest than expected, the Americans bounced back from their embarrassing loss to Puerto Rico in their opener and avoided dropping to 0-2, which would have matched their loss total from the previous 68 years.

K-State, city offer weekend entertainment alternatives for underage students

By Rachel Norris
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some students aren't quite 21 yet. Fortunately, there are options for students who are underage or simply choose not to take part in the bar scene.

With what started as First Friday held once a month, After Hours has evolved into a once-a-week program, said Lynn Brickley, Union Program Council Graduate Assistant Advisor.

"It has a strong following of students," said Brickley, graduate student in student counseling and personal services. "It's a nice alternative to the non-party scene and it's free."

Brickley said After Hours takes place from 9 p.m. to 2 a.m. on non-holiday Friday evenings in the Union.

She said students can watch a movie, discover a craft or activity, eat food, and participate in an event, such as "make-your-own-music-video."

After Hours is free to all who attend because it is co-sponsored each weekend with an organization on campus.

"The activities that take place depend on what the group wants," Brickley said.

Brickley said one popular attraction for students is the UPC Feature and Classic Films. Typically a film is shown in the Student Union on non-holiday weekends, Friday through Sunday, for $2.

The Union also offers other activities in the Union, Jeremy Glotzbach, sophomore in mechanical engineering, said.

"We have bowling, pool, snooker and an arcade in the basement of the Union," Glotzbach said.

Glotzbach said that when enjoying the activities the bowling alley has to offer, returning students will notice the new carpet, redone bathrooms and new felt on the billiards tables.

Glotzbach said there are student rates for bowling and billiards.

"Sunday through Thursday there are bowling and pool leagues with at least three games each night," Glotzbach said. "They are open to students and non-students."

The CrossRoads of Ecumenical Campus Ministry also is an option for people of all ages and is led by Pastor David Jones.

Jones, who has been a part of the CrossRoads of ECM for eight years, said there have been some changes, but there are several activities for everyone.

"The CrossRoads of ECM is for people who grew up in the church or didn't grow up in the church," he said. "They can ask questions and grow in faith and not be judged. It is an open atmosphere."

Jones said ECM hosts weekly activities, such as "Table Fellowship" on Sunday evenings and Bible study and worship on Tuesday evenings.

Illustration by Jordan Mizell | COLLEGIAN

But the CrossRoads of ECM is not only a place to gain spiritual growth. Topics of culture, politics and race also are discussed.

"Last semester, the CrossRoads of ECM held a cookout and picnic in City Park along with other groups on campus in hope to connect with the other groups. I hope we can continue this tradition."

Summer supplies moviegoers, music lovers with memorable moments

Most summers are filled with throwaway pop tunes, lip-synched by perfect faces and high-budget, megabucks-making movies that you forget as soon as you leave the theater. This summer, however, provided quality hit movies and plenty of room on radio for a variety of music.

In movies, this was the summer of sequels. I'm not talking about "The Chronicles of Riddick," but the movies people actually saw.

"Shrek 2" was a monster hit filled with witty allusions. "Spiderman 2" swung into theatres with a complex thought that provided deep insights into humanity and the quest for self. "Harry Potter and the Prisoner of Azkaban" cast a spell on audiences by adding a dark edge to the successful series.

Other highlights included new films by some of Hollywood's premiere auteurs. Michael Moore's surprise hit "Fahrenheit 9/11" and M. Night Shyamalan's "The Village" both inspired deep thought in viewers.

These movies provided audiences with a combination of intelligent filmmaking and box-office success.

Normal summer fare flopped by comparison.

"King Arthur" wouldn't have been a hit even in Camelot, while "Garfield" had all the value of a CGI hairball. "Soul Plane" never took off. According to imdb.com, even mighty "Troy," with a gross of $133 million, fell to "Shrek 2," which had a gross of $434 million.

This summer's music scene showed several vital signs in an industry I'd just about pulled the plug on. After nightmares of boy bands and pop tarts, this summer I woke up to fresh and different artists.

After years of rocking the indie circuit, the band Modest Mouse was finally able to crawl out of its hole and into the top 20. According to Billboard, their album "Good News For People Who Love Bad News" peaked at 19.

Teen rocker Avril Lavigne proved she's no punk by delivering a strong sophomore set, this time without the help of the Matrix.

The intelligent rap-funk duo Outkast continued their success with the eccentric-yet-sweet-smelling single "Roses."

At the top of the charts, Usher didn't lead anyone to his throne.

Many veteran acts revitalized their careers this summer as well. According to Billboard, the Beastie Boys filed away their fourth No. 1 album with "To the 5 Boroughs," and beach-party magnate Jimmy Buffett scored his first chart topper with the punny "License to Chill."

Prince earned his given name by keeping "Musicology" near the top of the charts all summer long.

This summer also introduced listeners to several new sounds.

After crashing the Stone Temple Pilots, Scott Weiland rose from the wreckage to form Velvet Revolver with ex-Guns N' Roses Slash, Duff McKagan and Matt Sorum.

Country fans have two reasons to hoot and holler given the success of newcomers Gretchen Wilson and Big & Rich.

Meanwhile, Britney Spears's "Onyx Hotel" was crumbling as an injured knee and wedding plans caused her to cancel many dates on the tour.

Overall, this summer produced enough entertainment to keep even the most voracious pop culture consumers satiated until May.

Moore releasing '9/11' on DVD and VHS on Oct. 5

President Bush will face a home-video barrage four weeks before the election. "Fahrenheit 9/11," Michael Moore's assault on Bush's handling of the Sept. 11 attacks, debuts on DVD and VHS Oct. 5.

The announcement Tuesday confirmed Moore's initial intention to have the film out shortly before Election Day, a time frame the director favored since May's Cannes Film Festival, where "Fahrenheit 9/11" won the top honor.

After the movie debuted to record box-office numbers for a documentary, distributor Lions Gate had indicated the movie might continue playing theatrically through the end of the year, potentially delaying the home-video release.

Among DVD extras will be a featurette examining the release of "Fahrenheit 9/11," which lost its theatrical distributor last spring after Disney refused to let subsidiary Miramax handle the film because of its political content.

No black rockers on Miller cans

A Miller Brewing Co. promotion celebrating the "50th Anniversary of Rock 'n' Roll" has Rolling Stone cover shots of several influential rock artists, but no black musicians.

Robert Thompson, a professor of pop culture at Syracuse University, said the absence is "beyond conspicuous" since black artists are often credited with inventing rock 'n' roll.

"It would be like doing a set of cans of six great Impressionist painters and not including any French people on it," Thompson said.

The brewer and magazine issued the cans this summer depicting Elvis Presley, Blondie, Alice Cooper, Bon Jovi, Def Leppard and Willie Nelson, as well as two guitars.

Gary Armstrong, chief marketing officer for Rolling Stone publisher Wenner Media, said race wasn't a consideration when choosing the artists.

"We didn't even consciously think pro or con, the same way that the only woman on there is Blondie. We just went with the people that we thought were appropriate."

Armstrong said some artists, such as the Jimi Hendrix estate, is protective of their images. "Again I think it might have had something to do with the beer."

Winfrey picked to serve on Chicago jury

Oprah Winfrey was picked to serve on a jury at Cook County Criminal Court. Winfrey walked into the courthouse Monday through an alternate entrance to avoid crowds, but officials said once inside the courtroom, she wouldn't receive any special treatment.

The talk show host had told reporters she didn't think she'd be picked because she's too opinionated. Winfrey added that if she were selected, "I'm just hoping it doesn't take longer than a week because I've got shows to do."

Psychiatrist said stalker competent for trial

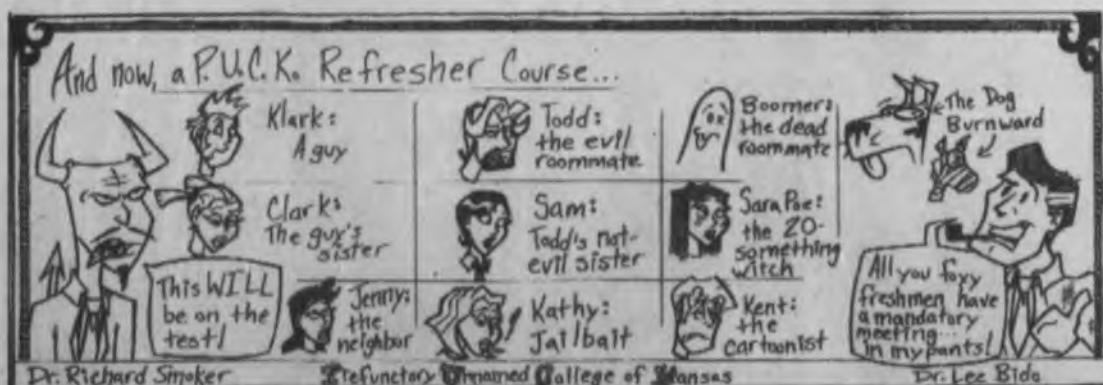

A woman accused of stalking and threatening Catherine Zeta-Jones is mentally fit to stand trial, a court-appointed psychiatrist said Monday.

Dr. Kal Sharma examined Dawnette Knight, 33, in jail, where she is being held on $1 million bail.

Sharma's written report is still pending. Superior Court Judge John Riley Jr. halted criminal proceedings July 30 and ordered a mental evaluation of Knight after she overdosed on barbiturates while in county jail. The preliminary hearing is scheduled to resume Sept. 9.

Jake Gawith sits in the house he and his roommates were allowed to move into after some renovations were made to repair water damage. Though they paid rent for June, they were not allowed to move in until July.

Students handle landlord problems

By Katie Payne
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jake Gawith's lease began June 1, but he and his two roommates were unable to move into their house until July.

When the landlord called to request a rent payment for July, Gawith said he questioned when they would be able to move in.

"We paid rent starting in June, but weren't able to move in until the middle of July," Gawith said. "Our lease runs from June first until the end of May."

Gawith said the reason for the delay he was given by the landlord was the need for renovation on the house. Some pipes had burst, and there was water damage.

"They had to replace some of the carpet that was water damaged. I think they replaced the linoleum in the kitchen and laundry room and patched part of the kitchen ceiling," he said.

Gawith and his roommates eventually were allowed to move in, and he said that relations with his landlord have improved. However, they are contemplating an attempt to get their June rent returned.

Friction between tenants and landlords does not always occur at the beginning of the relationship. When Keely Mead moved out of her house on Bertrand Street, she expected that she and her four roommates would each receive their safety deposits.

"I was the last one to check out, so I did the walk through with the landlord," Mead said. "She only mentioned that a floor was dirty or some blinds were dusty, so I thought we would get most of our money back."

However, Mead's landlord did not return any of the five $260 deposits, and also requested $90 from each roommate to cover damages she said they had inflicted on the property. Mead and her roommates decided to fight the landlord's decision.

"We talked to the student attorney. She helped us write a letter," Mead said. "Then we went to small claims court."

She said when she moved in, there was only one roommate present at the initial inspection. At that time, Mead said, the landlord told them all the damages that were present need not be reported, saying they would be repaired.

When Mead received a bill instead of her security deposit, she said there were charges for prior damage. A significant portion of the money was spent replacing a fiberglass bathtub that was damaged by previous residents, Mead said.

"There was a small spot on our front room carpet from the couch sitting on it all year," Mead said. "The landlord said that the whole carpet had to be replaced."

A previous tenant worked with Mead in her small claims suit to prove that the damage had been there when he moved out.

"There were the same damages every year. They were never fixed, but re-charged," said Mead. "In court, the landlord's check-in sheet had white-out marks and rooms that had been changed."

In small claims court, both sides were allowed to present their cases. In the end, the judge ruled no suit.

According to Sarah Barr, student legal services attorney, Mead's case is not a common one. She said most students who have a rental problem talk to Russell Fulmer in the Office of Consumer and Tenant Affairs, and he often is successful in mediating the landlord/tenant dispute.

The next step, said Barr, involves writing a letter to the landlord. She recommends tenants communicate with a landlord in writing and keep copies when making requests for repairs, not just when problems arise.

"Manhattan is one of the few cities in Kansas with a housing code for apartments. It's very detailed," she said. "For example, bedrooms must be a certain size and have a window."

Larry Hackney, director of human resources for the City of Manhattan, said while there is no formal complaint-lodging mechanism in Manhattan, a record of housing inspections is available in the city code enforcement office.

"The City of Manhattan provides an informational service. We are not attorneys, and we don't give legal advice, but we have copies of the Landlord and Tenant act available free of charge," Hackney said.

In some cases Barr handles, the tenant may be responsible for the money owed.

In these cases she tries to explain their specific responsibilities under their lease, which she says are for the most part well drawn.

"I try to help with the accountability issue, like I think you should when you're helping students and they're learning life's lessons," she said. "But I also have a big bowl of candy on my desk!"

Campus services available to address tenant issues

By Katie Payne
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Resources are available for K-State students who rent from Manhattan landlords and have questions about their rights as tenants.

Whether leasing from a landlord, an apartment complex or a property management corporation, tenants and landlords are guaranteed certain protections under the Kansas Residential Landlord and Tenant Act.

Russell Fulmer, director of Consumer and Tenant Affairs, is available to answer students' questions regarding their rental in the Office of Student Activities and Services located in the K-State Student Union.

"Because leases vary, I encourage students to come talk to me about these matters," said Fulmer.

"Some of the general problems I deal with include lease termination, receiving security deposits, dirtiness and mold and occasionally roommate conflicts."

Landlords are obligated to provide for certain conditions, he said.

"The landlord must comply with applicable building and housing codes and maintain reasonable care of the facility," Fulmer said.

He said his office maintains a website at www.ksu.edu/legal/handbook.htm, which summarizes the Act, offers advice for the lease process and describes recurring problems and steps for solution.

In addition, the Office of Consumer and Tenant Affairs maintains a model lease, containing optimal provisions students can review and suggest for use to their landlord.

Fulmer said one of the important parts of the leasing process is an inventory of the rental by the landlord and tenant. The law requires this take place within five days of the initial occupation, and includes documentation of damage that may already exist.

"If that is not documented, then the tenant could be responsible for the damage when they checkout," Fulmer said.

He said prospective tenants should pay careful attention to smoke detectors, locks on doors and occurrences of mold or mildew.

In order to provide positive tenant/landlord relations, Geary Mosburg, regional manager for Capstone Properties, the company that manages University Commons, said he recommends that renters take the time to carefully review their lease.

"We try to make it the easiest, most pleasant experience we can," Mosburg said.

"We give them a checklist and go through it with them."

Detainees sent to Kansas City

RCPD continues investigation

By Scott Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The 15 former El Cazador Mexican Restaurant and Cantina employees, detained by the Riley County Police Department since Thursday were transported Monday morning to Kansas City.

The detainees were taken to Immigration and Customs Enforcement facilities there, RCPD Director Mike Watson said.

"They were detained on behalf of the immigration service," Watson said. "We took them into custody because they were in this country illegally."

He said while the 15 immigrants and their employer, were discovered during the execution of multiple warrants, the warrants were in relation to other types of illegal activity.

El Cazador manager Santiago Palamino was charged with knowingly employing illegal immigrants.

"We were not actively looking for illegal immigrants," Watson said.

He declined to comment on the exact nature of the warrants, but said they were part of an ongoing investigation.

Watson said the warrants did not yield what officers were searching for, and the investigation would continue until the matter was fully resolved.

"This is something we are going to keep working on," he said.

Adult businesses approved by commission

City officials determine fees for employees of regulated business

By Joanna Rubick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

City commissioners voted Tuesday to amend Manhattan zoning regulations to allow for adult businesses.

Eric Cattell, assistant director for planning, presented the proposal to decide on adult business fees because they were not originally part of the ordinance.

The fees would include $250 for an adult business and $25 for managers, employees and entertainers.

The motion was passed 4-0.

Commissioner Mark Taussig wasn't present at the meeting.

The commissioners also discussed a request for $6 million for construction of a new building for the National Institute for Strategic Technology Acquisition and Commercialization, formerly Mid-America Commercialization Corporation, which creates new businesses and helps them grow.

The building, which would be located in the K-State Research Park on North Manhattan Avenue, would be owned by the city and sold at a later date.

Lyle Butler, president of Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce, said NISTAC helps create jobs in Manhattan.

"They're quality jobs; they're high-paying jobs," Butler said.

Because NISTAC will be creating more jobs, the city will recover its losses, said Ron Sampson, dean of business administration and former president of MACC.

"The city will ultimately recover its cost," Sampson said.

The new building would include office, lab, conference and pilot rooms.

"The thrust is about economic development," he said. "This isn't just about research; it's about jobs."

Concerns were raised about the price of the request.

"The problem I have with this is the price tag," Commissioner Ed Klimek said. "Six million is a big number. I would be very cautious when awarding this much money."

Further discussion on this topic will be taken place at the Sept. 7 City Commission meeting.

void left by the departures of All-America Lauren Goehring, Big 12 Libero of the Year Laura Downey-Wallace, and Kris and Cari Jensen.

"I say this a lot, but you don't replace those types of people," Fritz said. "They were instrumental in the history of K-State volleyball and a very important part of our success here. You don't replace them and you don't attempt to."

K-State does return a core group of players, with four seniors: setter Gabby Guerre, senior outside hitter Vali Hejjas, middle blocker Lisa Martin and outside hitter Michaela Franklin.

Guerre is a preseason All-Big 12 selection. Hejjas was the conference newcomer of the year last season and Martin received 2003 All-Big 12 honors.

Guerre said last year's loss in the NCAA Tournament will provide motivation for this season.

"Last year was a really great season with winning the Big 12 and going to the Sweet 16," she said. "It was kind of a hard finish, because we lost to Penn State and thought we could've gone farther."

For Hejjas, a personal goal is to become a more all-around player.

"My goal is to be more versatile and to pass well and be more concerned about setting than hitting," she said. "But I like to hit and get as many kills as I can."

Fritz said the seniors also have become role models for the young team, which features the largest incoming class of players Fritz has ever had.

"They have started taking on a stronger leadership role," she said. "They're all very experienced and extremely competitive and good positive influences on the younger players."

Of the newcomers, Fritz said junior college transfer Agata Rezende could make an immediate difference as an outside hitter. Freshman libero Angie Lasstra also may figure into the mix.

"We have some young players in our program that have been in the shadows and are ready to emerge and take more of a contributing role to our team - we will be dynamically different," Fritz said.

The team will be challenged early with a tough non-conference schedule that includes matches against 2003 Final Four teams Florida and Minnesota.

"Our goal is to try and prepare for the conference season, and therefore when we set out to schedule we try to put ourselves in a position to compete with some of the better teams in the country," Fritz said.

The conference schedule will be no easier, according to Fritz, as the Big 12 could be stronger than last year because of the level of experience that most teams return.

"From one through six or seven in the conference it will be a dogfight with so many juniors and seniors returning," she said.

attack and be a valuable part of our offense," she said. "She's started for us since her freshman year, so there's no situation she can't handle. In terms of her ability to do lots of different things well, she's playing the best volleyball that she's ever played."

Setting the example for a young squad will be an important task early in the season, Guerre said. "I think the biggest role for us is the leadership role to give the younger players confidence and make them feel welcome," she said. "It's easy for them to feel lost. Our involvement in their progression is very important."

Despite all the early accolades, Guerre said her only concern is where the Wildcats are at when the season concludes.

"Last season I was very proud to be a part of (the Big 12 championship team)," she said. "Pre-season polls, though, I don't look a lot into. I'm into how you finish up."

IRAQ | Holdups, member dissension make action on Iraq conference peace proposal unlikely, al-Sadr aides say

according to rescue worker Sadiq al-Shaibany.

Two of the deaths occurred when gunfire hit the office of the Badr Brigades, the militia of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, which is not involved in the fighting, according to Ridha Taqi, a SCIRI official.

Meanwhile, the military announced that a U.S. soldier was killed in an attack a day earlier in Baghdad, when insurgents fired rocket-propelled grenades at armored vehicles, disabling several, in an eastern part of the city.

At least 935 U.S. service-members have been killed in Iraq since March 2003.

The airstrike in Najaf came only hours after an eight-member delegation from Iraq's National Conference arrived in the holy city, brought in on U.S. military helicopters.

Their peace proposal offers amnesty and a place in the political process for al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militiamen if they put down their arms and leave Najaf's holy sites, including the Imam Ali Shrine, where fighters have taken refuge.

Al-Sadr aides said they welcomed the mission, but not the peace proposal.

"The demands of the committee are impossible. The shrine compound must be in the hands of the religious authorities. They are asking us to leave Najaf while we are the sons of Najaf," said Sheikh Ali Smeisim, an al-Sadr aide.

The Najaf fighting has overshadowed the National Conference, which was supposed to be a revolutionary moment in Iraq's democratic transformation, an unprecedented gathering of 1,300 Iraqis from all ethnic and religious groups for vigorous debate over their country's course.

But members of the conference decided to delay the gathering's main function — electing a form of national assembly — to give time for a peace mission to Najaf.

"This is not a negotiation. This is a friendly mission to convey the message of the National Conference," said delegation head Hussein al-Sadr, a distant relative of the cleric.

"We want to change the Mahdi Army into a political organization and to evacuate the shrine of Ali with the promise not to legally pursue those taking shelter there. This is what the government and all Iraqis want."

The peace mission was plagued by embarrassing holdups. A large delegation of 60 conference members had intended to go in a convoy on Tuesday to Najaf, 100 miles south of Baghdad.

That trip was canceled when a security escort could not be arranged, and instead the smaller team went.

Tuesday's mortar attack on the busy, central Rasheed Street was the second such deadly attack since the conference began Sunday.

Ghaith Abdul-Ahad | GETTY IMAGES

Hussein al-Sadr, left, the head of a delegation of members of the Iraqi National Conference, is surrounded by crowds, chanting for Moqtada Sadr, as he walks towards the shrine of Imam Ali to meet with clerics loyal to the radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr Tuesday in Najaf, Iraq. The delegation went to Najaf to deliver a message from the conference members in Baghdad to Moqtada, but failed to meet him while clashes continue in the area.

SafeRide begins fall semester with new cab company

By Joanna Rubick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A different taxi cab company will be providing services for SafeRide beginning tonight.

Yell-Bell Taxi Inc. was the only bidder when the contract was up for bid last May. The company won the bid for $27.25 per hour per cab.

Glen Puett, president and general manager of Yell-Bell, said each night they will provide five to eight taxis. There will be two people working the phone lines — one for operating and one for dispatching.

Puett said it will be easier for Yell-Bell to provide the service than A-One Cab Company out of Junction City, the company that provided it last year.

"They don't have an office in Manhattan, so they had to deal with long-distance phone call costs," he said. "I'll be running out of Manhattan."

SafeRide began last year as a service for K-State students.

How to Use SafeRide

Call: 539-0480

When: Thursday through Saturday

Time: 11 p.m. to 3 a.m.

"SafeRide is a free ride home for K-State students and their guests," SafeRide director Katie Bartko said. "It is a safe way to get home from the bars, the library, a friend's house or anywhere in Manhattan."

Bartko said they tried to make the service more accessible to students.

"Last year, one concern with the program was that students would get a busy signal due to only one person answering the calls," Bartko said. "So, this year we have added another person to answer phone calls, which should alleviate the problem."

Puett said one concern he has is abuse of the program. He said

41st Fort Riley soldier dies in Iraqi attack

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Fort Riley soldier died Monday in Iraq, becoming the third soldier from the post to be killed in the past week.

Sgt. David M. Heath, 30, was killed in Sadr City when his patrol came under small arms and rocket-propelled grenade attack.

He was assigned to Company B, 1st Battalion, 41st Infantry, 3rd Brigade, 1st Armored Division. In June, he was deployed to Iraq, following his first deployment there in 2003.

The news of Heath's death came the same day about 100 soldiers from the 1st Brigade were returning to Iraq.

"Sgt. Heath's death is a real reminder of the realities of war," said Sam Robinson, Fort Riley public affairs officer. "They're still at risk until

Peace plan in Iraq accepted by cleric

By Abdul Hussein Al-Obeidi
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NAJAF, Iraq — Radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr accepted a peace plan Wednesday, calling for his militiamen to disarm and leave their hideout in a revered Shiite shrine, raising hopes of ending a battle that has threatened to undermine Iraq's fledgling interim government.

But gunfire and explosions crackled across Najaf after the deal was announced and there was no indication of whether there could be a quick end to two weeks of fighting between al-Sadr's forces and U.S. soldiers and government troops in this holy city.

Al-Sadr has made contradictory statements in the past, and aides to the cleric said he still wanted to negotiate details of the peace deal.

In Washington, the Bush administration said al-Sadr needed to match words with Music coalition grooves in Manhattan

By Jessica Grant
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Last semester, the local music scene in Manhattan got a new sense of camaraderie when several community members united to form the Manhattan Music Coalition.

"I think that the Manhattan Music Coalition has brought more of a realization to all of the local artists in the area," said Bill Hurrelbrink, 2002 K-State alumni and bassist for local band Tripwire. "Now that everyone is back in town for the school year, I think it will continue to do the same thing."

The Manhattan Music Coalition formed last semester when Jamie Tucker, co-owner of PJ's Restaurant and Pub, working with Travis Edwards, called together several local bands in order to meet one another and discuss promotion techniques.

"Travis Edwards and Jamie Tucker started the Coalition, but I was the one who designed the first Web site," said Dave Spiker, one of the co-founders of the Manhattan Music Coalition. "We needed to start some kind of Health officials recommend meningitis vaccine, acknowledge disease's rarity

By Melissa Baier
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Although it's rare to contract, meningitis is a killer.

The disease, which has affected 110 students nationwide in the last year, killing 10, was forced into the national spotlight in 1999 during a broadcast of ABC's "20/20."

Suddenly an even-present disease became a public health priority. There wasn't an actual increase in the number of cases, just an increase in media coverage, said Jay Reppert, Lafene Health Center medical director.

The Centers for Disease Control began to encourage university clinics to inform students of the symptoms, the statistics, the risks and to offer vaccinations for this disease.

Students should be aware that "once a person develops symptoms, the illness can worsen very quickly and the patient can die in a matter of hours," Reppert said. "Fortunately, the disease is not highly contagious."

People exposed to the illness are treated to ensure they don't develop the disease as well.

Any communal living condition increases the risk of contracting this disease.

For all students attending college, there is a risk of 0.6 in 100,000 in contracting the disease. The greatest risk, however, is to freshmen who live in the residence halls, Reppert said. It can affect 4.6 in 100,000 students.

In April, Andy Marso, a student at the University of Kansas, was diagnosed with the disease. As of Aug. 16, Marso remained in fair condition at the hospital.

The last case of this disease at K-State was in 1996.

Although actual risk of contracting this disease is rare, the severity of the disease is what makes vaccination such an issue. Reppert said this form of meningitis is "unfortunately a

Tuition, financial assistance rates up from last year

By Annie M. Lewis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students saw a rise in the cost of tuition this semester and, for most, a rise in their financial aid.

Associate Vice President of Finance Bruce Shubert said this semester was the most dramatic increase K-State will see in some time.

"For a resident taking 15 hours, tuition increased $300 a semester," Shubert said. "Twenty-two to 25 percent of that increase in tuition was added to need-based financial aid."

With the rise in the cost of tuition, financial aid was not overlooked, he said.

"There was added an additional $2.3 million to need based financial aid," Shubert said.

Communication with the students always is a weighing factor in administrative decisions, he said.

"In the next couple of months the upper-level administration will talk to student leadership and faculty leadership about funding needs," Shubert said.

"It's very important for students to communicate their needs with their elected representatives."

Director of Admissions and Student Financial Assistance Larry Moeder said there always is going to be financial aid for students that need it.

"The rise in tuition is not unique to K-State. There is just not enough support for higher education out there, and that is why colleges across the nation are getting costlier," he said.

"But as the cost rises, the general need of a student increases, and a student's eligibility for need-based aid will increase with it."

Last year the cost of in-state tuition per credit hour was $117, compared to $137 this year. For out-of-state students the cost jumped from $380 to $429, Moeder said.

He said there are recommendations being submitted in Congress to help students pay for school.

"One of the proposals is to increase loan limits. There are also proposals to increase grant limits," he said.

"Our goal here at K-State is not to force any student out of school due to the high cost. That is why we have set aside money over the past few years from the increase in tuition."

Brandi Sawin, junior in agricultural business, said she wasn't too upset about the rise.

"Even though the tuition increased, I got more financial aid this year," she said. "So it all equalled out in the end."

Sawin said that she wasn't surprised at the tuition hike this year.

"I figured it would go up," she said.

"I would hate to see the price for school in five or ten years."

Office warns K-State students of e-mailed financial aid scam

By Melissa Hildebrand
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This summer K-State students were informed of a financial aid scam through an e-mail sent from the Office of Student Financial Assistance.

According to the e-mail, individuals were pretending to be representatives of the U.S. Department of Education to seek bank account numbers.

Tanya McGee, associate director of financial aid, said these individuals contacted students over the phone and implied that for a charge of $250 they could change student loans to $8,000 of grant money, needing their bank account number to make the transaction.

Larry Moeder, director of admissions and student financial assistance, said a few students contacted the financial aid office after receiving the phone call, and the office took their information and forwarded it to the Department of Education.

"Students were grateful that we informed them of the scam that was taking place," Moeder said.

"I haven't heard of any student here at K-State being negatively affected by it," McGee said.

She said the scam is nation-wide and the Department of Education is conducting an on-going investigation.

Moeder, who has worked in the financial aid office for 27 years, said this is the first time he has ever seen a scam of this sort.

He was informed of the scam through an e-mail sent from the Department of Education, alerting all University financial aid offices.

McGee said it seems like she

TO THE POINT Vaccine against meningitis a potential lifesaver

Although the risk of contracting meningitis is minimal, K-State students seriously should consider getting vaccinated for this disease.

The vaccine costs only $65, a paltry sum when compared to the costs of hospitalization, severe disability or death, outcomes that occur in roughly 25 percent of meningitis cases.

Students living in residence halls face a particularly higher risk compared to those living off campus, because the disease can be spread through shared bathrooms and drinking fountains.

While the incidence remains very low in cases, the costs are simply too high for students to ignore.

This disease has severe consequences for otherwise healthy people. Andy Marso, a University of Kansas student who contracted the disease in April, remains hospitalized five months later.

Currently, only a few hundred students are vaccinated every year at K-State, and if the disease is spread to our campus, that's far too few.

Officials at the university continue to inform students of the continual risk of meningitis, but now it is up to individuals.

Receiving the meningitis vaccine not only helps prevent the potentially fatal ailment for yourself, but also for roommates and communal living members.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

CHANCE YORK

There is a terrible tragedy most people don't know about that's occurring everyday, right here in Manhattan.

This is a story of occupational discrimination, something I consider downright immoral.

Next time you decide to see a movie at Manhattan's Seth Childs Cinemas, take a good long look at the left side of the glassed-in ticket window.

There you'll see posted the sign that has sickened and disgusted me for years. It's a sign that demonstrates the outrageous prejudices that are still alive in our society.

Yes, it's true. Seth Childs Cinemas does not allow pirates inside the building whatsoever.

In fact, the sign, which features a rough sketch of a pirate, clearly states: "no pirates," leaving all of our seagoing mercenary friends out of luck when it comes to catching the latest blockbuster.

Here's my problem. I love going to movies. It's my favorite pastime. When I was a young teenager, it was the only place I could go to see some nudity.

But recently I've also been getting into pirates and their whole swashbuckling lifestyle. If you think about it, being a pirate wouldn't be so terrible.

First of all, as a pirate you have options.

You get to choose, from the eye patch, the peg leg and the pet bird. But the best thing is you get to say things like "yo ho ho and a bottle of rum."

Now seriously, if I said "yo ho ho and a bottle of rum" in public without proper pirate attire, I'd be in store for a serious beating, but as a pirate I could say things like that all day long and all people would do is smile and say "that silly pirate."

And that's because 99 percent of being a pirate is showmanship.

The thing I'm dreading though is wearing the hook. Does it have to be a hook? Could it be one of those claws out of a coin-operated grab machine?

I think I'd feel a little bit more comfortable grocery shopping if I had a claw instead of a hook.

I'm certainly not going to be reaching for a twenty-pound bag of charcoal on the top shelf with a hook. That's insanity. I'd be laid up in the hospital for a week.

I guess I wouldn't really want to wear the eye patch either. I can't stand having glasses on; the eye patch would kill me - always shifting and adjusting. Maybe I'll just walk around with one eye always closed like a crazy person.

The bird is a huge turnoff too. Can you imagine just having a conversation with someone on the street, and the bird defecates right there on your shoulder? That's awkward. Now that I think about it, I don't want to be a pirate that bad after all, but no one's gonna change my mind about letting them into the theater. What someone does for a living is no one else's business.

Besides, if they should be trying to keep anybody out based solely on their profession, it's the state health inspector.

Things just don't add up. Why pirates? Perhaps it's the vulgar language, the pillaging, the burning of people's homes and businesses.

But if that's the case then there's a lot of people living in the K.C. metro area that shouldn't be allowed into the movies either.

And you would think with a hit movie like "Pirates of the Caribbean," theaters would be more than pleased to let real-life pirates in.

What this boils down to folks is exploitation.

That's why in protest I'll be boycotting the movie theater for a whole week, or maybe a little less if something really good comes out, but you get the point.

Chance is a freshman in English. You can e-

Columnist predicts year's sensations

JAMES HURLA

Step into my lair and gaze into my crystal ball.

Behold the power of prediction, as someone skinnier and slightly less annoying than Chris "Swami" Berman clues you in on what to expect in the coming year.

Inspired by "Mallrats," I will rely on my magical third nipple to prognosticate the big news from the coming months.

Bush wins, Bush loses

Bush will play fair, but exploit the country's electoral process. He will win a slim majority of electoral votes, but lose the popular vote.

Florida's electoral votes will go to Alan Keyes following a new debacle involving electronic voting, a stray duck and El Nino. Keyes will be unable to accept the votes due to the fact he is running for office in Nicaragua.

The Democrats will go on to take the Congress in the mid-term elections and push through the abolition of the electoral college. Future presidents will be chosen based on their hair.

Drowning his sorrow

Following his defeat in November, John Kerry will seek comfort in the bottom of a bottle.

Upon entering the bar, the bartender will look at him and say, "Hey, buddy, why the long face?"

Keeping '85 alive

The Royals win the World Series for the first time since 1985.

Pushed along by the return of Aaron Guiel and a West Nile epidemic that strikes the rest of the league, Kansas City will win by default.

Ecologically speaking

Facing budget cuts, the college will merge with Housing and Dining Services.

The university will prevent an uproar by labeling the move "early job placement."

Hell on Earth

Confirming rumors, the eighth gateway to hell under old Denison will open.

The university's steps to preclude this occurrence by trapping the angel of all evil underground with a thin layer of holy grass will fail and Satan will reign over the Earth.

Heisman hopes

Darren Sproles will win the Heisman, and the news media will be shameless about invading his personal life during his chase.

Sproles will carry the team, including literally, when he picks up his offensive tackle to throw at defenders on his way to the end zone. The Little People of America will retire Sproles' jersey.

Wefald announces his retirement

I have no reason to believe this other than a guess. The man has done great things for this university, and he continues to do more. But he's getting old.

He's an expert at delegating authority; his style of leadership caused explosive success, and it is now stabilized.

He will make the announcement in the spring and retire to North Dakota.

Going out on a limb

For my final prediction, I will come out of left field. There will be a drug bust at a trailer park.

I know some of these may seem far-fetched, and you might wish to discuss them with me further. Please feel free to walk over to the newsroom and find me.

But please, keep your hands off my crystal ball.

Union polling station relocated

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The polling place once located in the K-State Student Union is no more.

Riley County Clerk Rich Vargo said the polling place was relocated to Meadowlark Hills Retirement Community.

Jack Connaughton, associate director of the Union, said the decision for the move was made by the county clerk.

"Every election they would just call us up and we were happy to be able to host them," he said. "They didn't call us for the last primary election."

Vargo said the change in location was due to voter turnout.

"We had it at the Union for several years and the largest participation we've had was usually about six voters," he said.

The cost to run the polls also was an issue, Vargo said.

"It just wasn't financially economical for the taxpayer," he said.

vice president, said it would be more convenient to have a polling place on campus.

"It would be more accessible for students," he said.

Vargo said some students don't even register to vote in Manhattan.

"Several will send an application to their home county to get an absentee ballot through the mail," he said.

A change in the polling location shouldn't affect a student's decision to vote, Vargo said.

"We find if people want to vote, they will learn where their polling place is, and they will go vote," he said.

Ankrom agreed.

"Hopefully everyone that does take time to register will vote no matter where it is," he said.

Local officials emphasize election awareness

Ever thought about being a senator?

It's not entirely out of the question, considering "anyone can run for the general election as a write-in candidate at this point," said Sue Seitz, Riley County account clerk.

Although write-in candidates don't always win, they always are encouraged to run a campaign, Seitz said.

Student candidates have a built-in support group, said Justin Kastner, 1998 K-State graduate in food science and industry and leadership studies.

"With the support of the university, any student candidate would feel comforted," he said.

Kastner ran for city commissioner during his junior year and won with a 25 percent edge over other candidates, Everett said.

"All K-State students, regardless of where they are from, are welcomed participants in the Manhattan community," Kastner said. "They have every right and privilege of being involved."

Perhaps the simplest way for students to stay involved with the election process is to vote.

Voter registration forms must be sent to the county election office 14 days prior to the election, Seitz said. Voters must enclose a copy of a photo ID and proof of mailing address, she added.

"These are new rules and regulations due to the Help America Vote Act, a law trying to assure no problems happen with this election, especially when following the 2000 election crisis," Seitz said.

Voting is more than marking a few names on a ballot, said Rich Vargo, Riley County clerk and election official. Vargo said students should contact the state political parties to get involved with the process now.

With almost two months left before the Nov. 2 general election, candidates across the country are campaigning for coveted city, county, state and national offices. But some people, especially college students, prioritize other events and issues before the elections, Vargo said.

"Students have the lowest voter turnout of all age groups," he said. "Electing officials is a privilege and should be taken seriously. And for college students, that may be a hard concept."

Vargo said his office can help students, even if they don't vote in Riley County.

"A lot of K-State students are not from the Manhattan area, so they also should consider an absentee ballot," Vargo said.

Manhattan Mayor Brad Everett said college students' votes are as important as those of other demographics.

"We encourage college students to get a closer look at the election process," Everett said.

Registration and absentee ballot forms can be found at the Riley County Web site, www.co.riley.ks.us.

Royal letdown too much to bear

MICHAEL ASHFORD

As a die-hard sports fan, I don't take disappointments lightly. I hate it when a team I cheer for fails to meet expectations.

I complain and threaten to go into superstitious fits that, in my mind, will somehow make the pain of failure turn into a warm feeling deep in my soul.

One particular team has sent me over the top this summer. They have been so disappointing that from here on out, I refuse to get caught up in any excitement this team generates until proven otherwise.

Say hello to the Kansas City Royals, Major League Baseball's biggest flop of the season.

I have never been the biggest fan of the Royals, or the MLB for that matter. I prefer a college game any day of the week.

But I was sucked in this year. I was intrigued by the unexpected success the Royals had in 2003, and I wanted more from the Boys in Blue.

I bought into the preseason hype surrounding the Royals, and did it ever come back and sting me like an errant Mike MacDougal fastball to the head.

I bought into the idea that with the acquisitions of veterans Benito Santiago and Juan Gonzalez, coupled with the return of Mike Sweeney, Joe Randa, Angel Berroa and Carlos Beltran, the Royals would win the American League Central.

I knew by adding Jimmy Gobble and Zack Greinke to the pitching rotation, the last piece of the playoff puzzle would fall into place, and the Royals would cruise.

What a waste of time and energy.

The Royals are the second-worst team in baseball, saved from the last spot by the Arizona Diamondbacks.

They have crushed the playoff hopes of thousands of Kansas City area baseball fans and have turned me off of Royals baseball seemingly for good.

The Royals can't pitch, hit or make a play when it matters most.

The season started out promising on Opening Day when Beltran hit the game-winning home run to complete a ninth-inning comeback against the Chicago White Sox.

Who knew that would be the high point of the season?

Now Beltran is gone, the Royals can't buy a win for one of their pitchers, and the starting lineup changes faster than the bullpen can blow a ninth-inning lead.

Beltran was traded to Houston June 24, but even he didn't help while he was with the Royals. The team was well out of first place with a pathetic record of 28-41 when Beltran left town.

Yes, there have been injuries to members of the starting lineup, such as Joe Randa (knee), Juan Gonzalez (back), and Mike Sweeney (back). But even when the players are healthy, the Royals still lose.

The fact is the Royals have been doing this to fans for years.

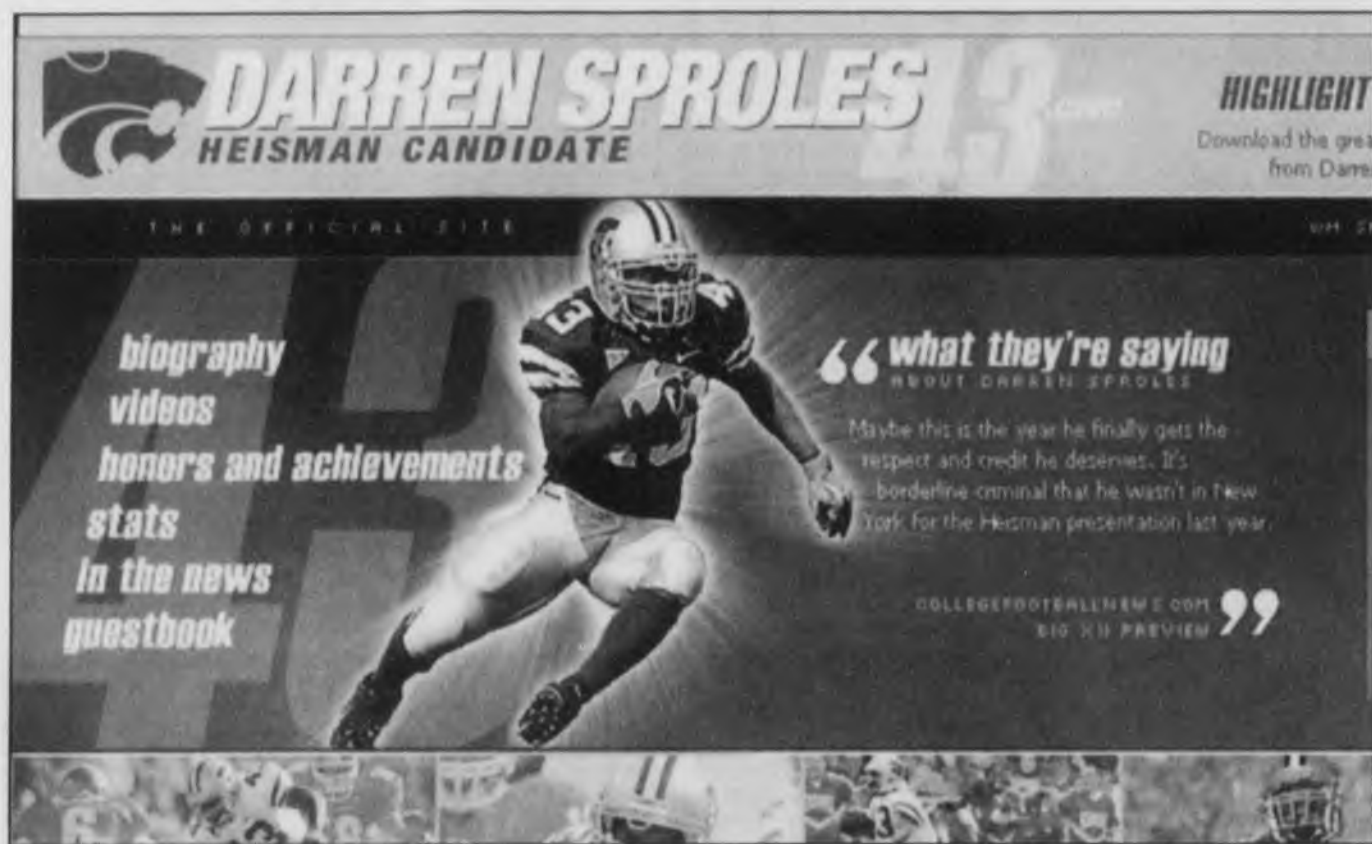

The Royals haven't been to the playoffs since their World Series run in 1985. In the 19 years since then, the Royals have gone into many seasons with high expectations, only to fall flat on their faces. Most often, the Royals are out of the picture by mid-June.

The Royals are a hopeless cause, and I will no longer waste my time caring about their lackluster excuse for baseball.

So to Tony Pena and the Kansas City Royals: NO Podemos Juntos.

Michael is a junior in open-option. You can e-mail him at sports@pub.ksu.edu.

Video clips, stats on Athletic Department site assist in promoting Heisman hopeful Sproles

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's no secret to K-State football fans senior running back Darren Sproles is a 2004 Heisman candidate.

Now, everyone outside of Wildcat nation will know.

On July 21, the K-State Department of Athletics launched www.darrensproles43.com to promote Sproles' Heisman campaign.

The site consists of a biography on the 5-foot 7-inch, 180-pound back from Olathe, video highlights, game-by-game recaps, statistics, records and accomplishments, quotes from prominent people in the football world, links to news articles and a guestbook for fans to leave Sproles notes of encouragement.

K-State Sports Information Director Garry Bowman said the idea for the site came before the Annual Purple-White Spring game in May.

"Before spring practice we were trying to think of different ways to feature Darren and something fun for our fans," Bowman said. "I thought it would be a good way to publicize him."

Sproles is the first Heisman contender at K-State since 1998, when then quarterback Michael Bishop was the runner-up behind Texas' Ricky Williams. During Bishop's run, Coach Bill Snyder did not promote his quarterback, and at times kept Bishop away from the media.

This year is different.

"I sat down with Coach Snyder and wanted to know what he felt comfortable with," Bowman said. "He wanted it to be proactive and the Internet is such a great tool because you can put so much information on there."

Snyder said before the Spring Game, Sproles is capable of handling the Heisman hype.

"What's important is how Darren is able to deal with it," Snyder said. "I have all the confidence in the world in Darren Sproles. He is very capable of handling it extremely well."

Department of Athletics Internet Coordinator David Smoller then went to work.

"I worked on it pretty much everyday," Smoller said. "To get it going I worked on it 10 hours a day for three weeks straight."

During the season, the Web site will be updated with the latest news, statistics and video-clips from the week's previous game.

Smoller said the site is complete until the season starts, and there are several features fans should check out.

"Everyone is talking about the highlight video," he said. "It's definitely a must see. Also, the guestbook turned out better than we thought. There are postings from all over the world."

Although Smoller's work on the Web site could possibly play a role in Sproles winning the Heisman, said it is really up to Darren to win the award.

"The Heisman really depends on what Darren does on the field and he deserves it, so I can't really take credit for any of it," Smoller said.

Along with the Heisman award, Sproles is also a candidate for the Doak Walker Award, Walter Camp Trophy and Maxwell Trophy.

Sproles is also closing in on Ricky Williams' Big 12 Conference all-purpose yard record, trailing by 1,247 yards coming into the 2004 season.

Wildcats gaining respect in Big 12

By Josh Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Respect — it's something the Wildcat football team has been gradually earning over the years during the program's ascent from conference bottom-feeder in the 1980's to 2004 Bowl Championship Series participant.

Coming off K-State's first-ever Big 12 Championship last season, some players are seeing a change in the regional and national perception of the program.

"It's time that people start recognizing us," said junior line-backer Ted Sims earlier this month at media day.

"Each year we'll be contenders for the Big 12 Championship, and I think just now people are starting to realize that."

Perhaps the biggest signal of a shift in the conference power structure came from the mouths of one of K-State's rivals — the Nebraska Cornhuskers.

Prior to the start of fall practice, first-year Nebraska coach Bill Callahan told reporters the Big 12 North crown goes through Manhattan.

"The balance of power within this division has changed," Callahan said in an Aug. 5 Associated Press story.

"We've got to do a good job of getting back and dominating the Big 12 North."

Kansas State has proven they can win and control this division. We have to get back to beating Kansas State."

Losing four of the last six games to the Wildcats even had Nebraska Athletic Director Steve Pederson admitting K-State now holds the power in the North, saying the shift was "hard for me to fathom."

Head football coach Bill Snyder answers reporters questions during media day on August 7. Snyder and the football team are coming off a Big 12 Championship last season as well as being a 2004 Bowl Championship Series participant.

Press article on Media Day, several Wildcats could not help but flash a smile.

"It feels real good, because Nebraska's a great team, and they've been winning for so long," senior cornerback Cedrick Williams said.

"It's kind of like the tables have turned," he said.

Senior wide receiver Tony Madison said he shared the same sentiments but wasn't about to dismiss the Cornhuskers.

"That is a good feeling to know that Nebraska is finally giving us some respect, but at the same time I think they're going to be a large part of that Big 12 North," he said.

The Wildcats enter the season ranked No. 12 in the country and are the media's pick to head to the Big 12 Championship game again.

Intramurals provide outlet for involvement

By Stacy Ryan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This fall, students have the opportunity to compete in intramural team sports from flag football and soccer to individual sports, handball and badminton.

For students interested in intramurals, sponsored by Recreational Services, forms are available to fill out in the business office at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

"You just need to get together a group of friends or co-workers and come in and sign up," Intramural Coordinator John Wondra said.

The deadline to turn in entries for the 10 sports offered this session is by 5 p.m. Thursday, Aug. 26.

Flag football games begin Aug. 31, and soccer kicks off on Sept. 2.

There also is a fee for participating in intramurals.

"For major team sports it is $20 per team, and for individual and dual sports the cost is one dollar per person," Wondra said.

Students become involved in intramurals for a number of different reasons.

"It's good to get involved because you get to meet lots of people," said Brett Kramer, intramural chair for Delta Upsilon fraternity.

Involvement was key to Delta Upsilon's success when they were named the 2003-2004 Fraternity Division Intramural Points Champions, Kramer said.

"It's not that we were really good at everything — we just had somebody in every single event that was scored for points," he said.

"We just participated, and that's what helped us win."

Swimmers shatter relay record

ATHENS, Greece — The United States smashed swimming's oldest record in winning the women's 800-meter freestyle relay Wednesday night for the third consecutive Olympics.

Natalie Coughlin, Carly Piper, Dana Vollmer and Kaitlin Sandeno finished in a world-record 7 minutes, 53.42 seconds — more than 2 seconds better than the old mark of 7:55.47, set 17 years ago by the former East Germany.

China earned silver in 7:55.97 and Germany took bronze in 7:57.35.

The United States won the event in 1996 and 2000 — the only other times it's been contested in the Olympics. The Americans also are the reigning world champions.

Roddick, Williams make early exit

ATHENS, Greece — Andy Roddick hit one last errant shot into the net and hung his head, his medal hopes over. A short while later, Venus Williams was gone, too.

In back-to-back stunners at the Olympic tennis tournament, Roddick was upset by No. 16 Fernando Gonzalez of Chile 6-4, 6-4, and defending gold medalist Williams lost to Mary Pierce of France 6-4, 6-4. Both were third-round matches.

For the first time since tennis returned to the Olympics as a medal sport in 1988, no U.S. woman will win a singles medal.

Hamm first U.S. male champ in all-around

ATHENS, Greece — After falling onto the edge of a judge's table on the landing of his vault, Paul Hamm put on two of the most spectacular routines of his career to win Olympic gold, the first ever by a U.S. man and only the second by an American.

Needing a 9.825 on high bar — his best event — to tie Kim Dae-eun of South Korea for gold, Hamm was dazzling.

His 0.012 margin of victory was the closest in men's Olympic history.

The Manhattan Music Coalition Web site, mmclive.com, contains a calendar of information about performances, as well as a help page and a forum for feedback.

"Right now, we are revamping the whole Web site," Shawn Leeth, co-founder, said. "We are trying to divvy things up a little differently within the Coalition."

Leeth also said there were problems with the old open forum, which are now fixed.

"With the new site, bands will be able to log in and update their own personal information," Spiker said.

"With the new forum, people will have to log in and we will be able to trace any negative comments and block that user from the site. There really is no reason for negativity within the site; we all need to be constructive," Leeth said.

Leeth said the new Web site will have more current content.

"Basically our new Web site will be much more updated and will have a lot more fresh material," Leeth said.

"We are also trying to start a section where people can write band or show reviews. We really want to get the general public much more involved. We also want to have a bit more band and venue information."

The Coalition ran into problems this summer when Gumby's Pizza and Pub closed their bar section. With Gumby's gone from the local music scene, the only remaining venues for local music are PJ's Restaurant and Pub and Auntie Mae's Parlor.

Band members said that with Gumby's closing, the burden will be felt on newer bands.

"While we were on tour, we heard that Gumby's had closed. We were pretty bummed about it, because we liked playing there. Having one less venue in a town is never good, and I fear that this closing will be particularly hard on newer bands," said Casey Arbenz, K-State instructor and bassist for the band Clap.

Spiker also said one of the goals of the Coalition for this semester is organizing benefit shows.

"We don't have any money," Spiker said. "We're a non-profit organization. We are going to try and raise funds for the Coalition through benefit shows."

"With the Manhattan Music Coalition, we are trying to get to the point that the average public is involved," Leeth said.

"The local music scene in Manhattan is really strong within itself. We just need more students and members of the public."

Cox Bros. BBQ plays host to jazz musicians

By Will Klusener
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Cox Bros. BBQ is vying for a reputation for good music by offering bimonthly blues and jazz concerts.

Dave Elmo Bailey, a Manhattan musician, said he started the trend of concerts several years ago when he moved back from Chicago.

"I came back from Chicago and wanted to make music," Bailey said. "So I called up some friends to play, and it went over really well. The scene was lacking, and we wanted to bring back some live music to Manhattan. The concerts were so well received that we decided to bring in some national artists also."

"Many of the musicians are friends of mine, and most are touring at the time," Bailey said.

"We call and try to fit them into an open slot on their schedule."

Greg "Fingers" Taylor, harmonica player and longtime band-mate of Jimmy Buffet, as well as Jason Ricci and New Blood are slated to perform later this year, along with some local musicians, Bailey said. He said the concert is open to all ages.

"Jason Ricci is, in my opinion, the Jimi Hendrix of the harmonica," Bailey said. "We want to include all ages, and we're open to suggestions anyone might have about music."

Wayne Goins, jazz instructor at Kansas State, has performed at Cox Bros. and encourages students to attend the concerts. He said he thinks there couldn't be a better location for a blues and jazz concert.

"It has a special place in American music," Goins said. "Blues, like jazz, is an American art form and should be maintained. One of the best ways to keep it alive is through community support, and that includes the students here at K-State. Cox Bros. is one of the premier venues for blues and jazz."

Craig Treinen, jazz instructor at Kansas State, said he feels that a deeper understanding of American culture can be gained from listening to blues.

"Jazz is the only truly American art form," Treinen said. "No matter when you hear blues or jazz you'll hear something different each time. It's a melting pot for different types of music, really. In a way, it mirrors our own culture."

Music isn't the only item on the menu at Cox Bros. They offer a broad selection of food choices as well, and Bailey said he isn't lost on this fact.

"I've played a lot of gigs in a lot of cities. I've had barbecue all over the country, and the food here is absolutely top notch," Bailey said. "They've got excellent barbecue, pulled pork and some cajun dishes including an award-winning chicken gumbo."

Bailey said he is determined to keep blues and jazz alive in Manhattan and to provide quality entertainment for all.

"It seems that on a daily basis we lose one of the old masters, and it appears that blues is one step closer to the grave," Bailey said. "I'm not going to let that happen."

50 Topeka soldiers mobilize for Iraq

By JOHN MILBURN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Armed with good thoughts from well-wishers, about 50 Kansas Army National Guard soldiers prepared Wednesday for a year in Iraq.

The soldiers will become part of the New York Army National Guard's 42nd Division, historically nicknamed the Rainbow Division, reflecting the seven states from which soldiers are drawn.

Maj. Eric Bishop, officer in charge of the Kansas soldiers, said his family ranked at the top of his concerns as he prepared to leave for Fort Drum, N.Y. His wife, Capt. Kimberly Bishop, is expected to go to Iraq later this year with another Kansas unit.

"Probably my biggest concern is the health and welfare of my family," Bishop said.

A family member will watch his four children — ages 1 to 20 — during the next year, minimizing the disruption.

Kansas' history with the 42nd Division dates to World War I, when the state provided 12 truck companies formed in Kansas City, Kan., Chanute, Dodge City, Parsons, Manhattan and Pratt.

Bishop said the biggest challenge was distributing information to the soldiers who had never worked as a unit. Some learned of their orders to report to Topeka for mobilization "by word of mouth," he said.

"Most of these people I have never seen before in my life," he said. "But they are all professional soldiers, and they are taking this job serious."

Bishop said the unit has been told what to expect and what skills need to be honed before they spend the next year overseas.

In the coming months, 1,100 Kansas Army National Guard soldiers will be mobilizing for a year's duty in Iraq, including the 891st Engineer Battalion based in Iola and the 778th Transportation Company of Kansas City, Kan.

Kansas has about 5,500 soldiers in the Army National Guard, with about 1,690, or 31 percent, deployed or mobilized. No members of the Kansas Army National Guard have died in Iraq since the war began in March 2003.

Gov. Kathleen Sebelius, who addressed the soldiers, said governors are concerned about the level of participation in the war by the National Guard and the ability to sustain those efforts. She said close to 40 percent of all U.S. soldiers in Iraq soon will be from the nation's reserves.

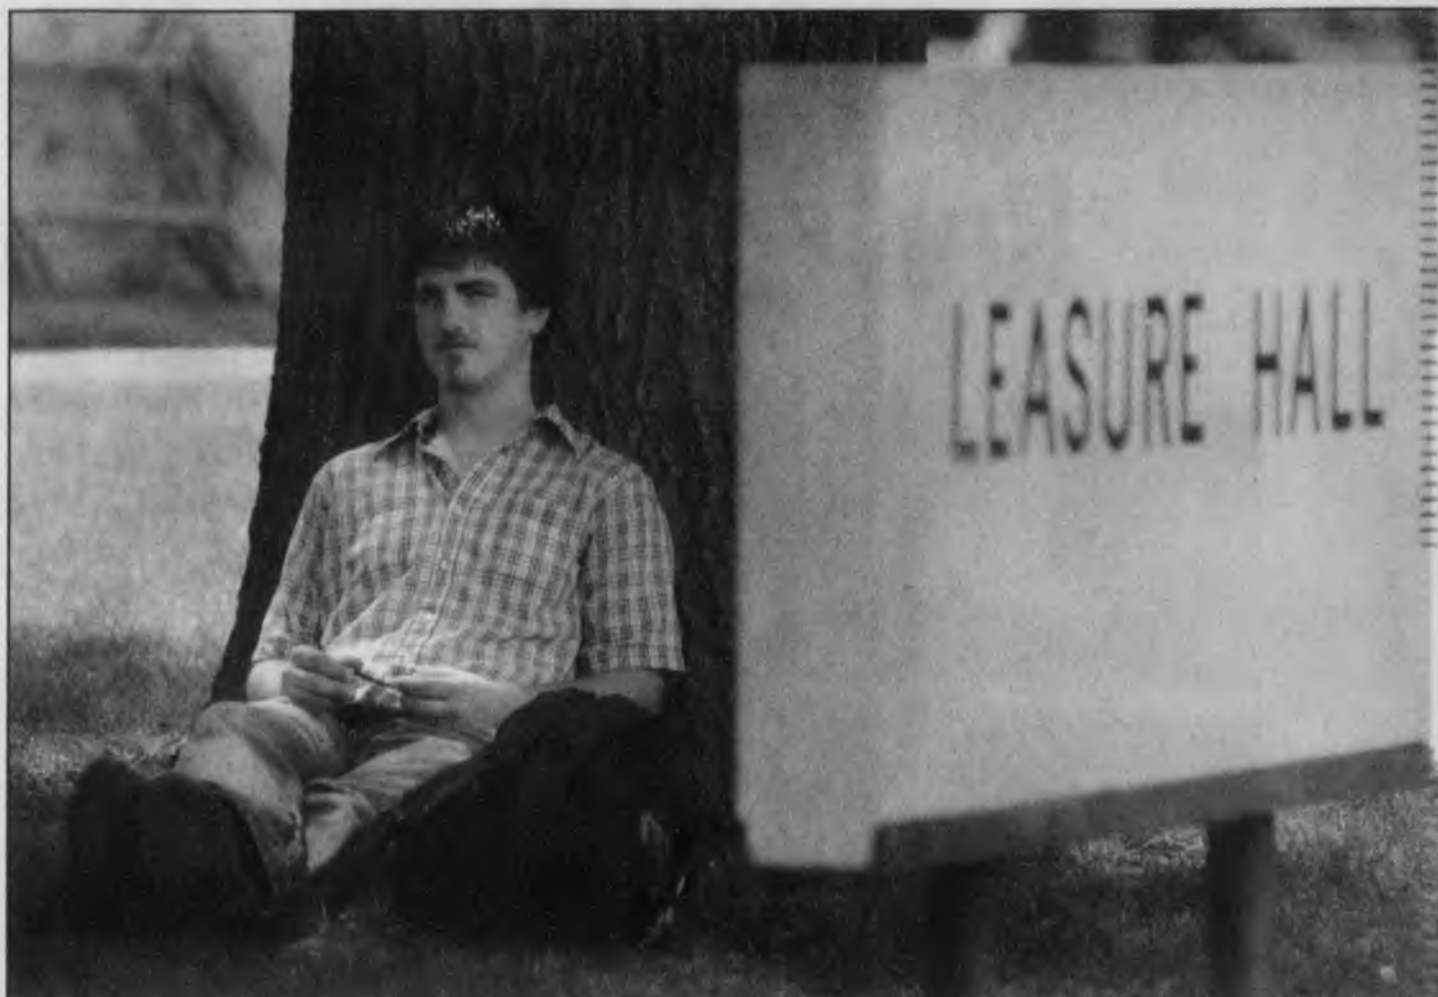

Sebelius said soldiers and their employers were making no small sacrifice to fight the war, while maintaining their lives and businesses back home.

Spec. Eric Cooper, 20, of Salina, kept the deployment in perspective, leaving a job repairing and refurbishing military equipment for the National Guard at Fort Riley, where several thousand active duty soldiers are serving in Iraq.

While Cooper was saying his goodbyes Wednesday, about 100 soldiers from the 1st Brigade of the 1st Infantry Division returned to Fort Riley after nearly a year in Iraq.

The remaining 3,400 soldiers from the brigade will return to Kansas through October, while soldiers with the 3rd Brigade, 1st Armored Division, also based at Fort Riley, continue their training for a possible second rotation to Iraq.

Political activists in Kansas and Missouri report FBI interviews

By DAVID TWIDDY
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — FBI counterterrorism agents interviewed at least a dozen political activists in Kansas and Missouri last month about potential attacks on news vehicles at the Democratic National Convention in Boston, activists and FBI officials said.

Spokesmen for the bureau said questioning is routine when authorities get credible information involving potential violence.

But activists question why they were targeted and said they believe the FBI was trying to intimidate them from organizing or participating in political protests during the Democratic convention and the Republican convention this month in New York.

Jeff Lanza, a spokesman for the FBI in Kansas City, said the bureau had interviewed about a dozen people in the Kansas City area and Lawrence, Kan., as part of a nationwide canvassing by agents in the days leading up to the Democratic convention.

Edge group stresses attendance at redevelopment meeting

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Aggieville Campus Edge Redevelopment Group will host two public meetings to discuss the proposed redevelopment project.

Jeff Levin, co-owner of Varney's Book Store, said the meeting is required before the plans are sent to the commission.

"After the meetings we will start putting together documents and synthesizing inputs from the public to develop a document to be sent to city commission," he said.

Levin said he hopes to see a big turnout because of the effort the group has put forth to make people aware of the meeting.

"We have sent out hundreds of postcards to businesses, property owners and tenants in the area, hoping that everyone has a sense that they have an opportunity to participate," he said.

Designs and plans will be presented at the meeting, Levin said. "One of the plans we are looking at is if it will make sense to have a joint parking garage to alleviate K-State parking as well as Aggieville parking as it grows and becomes more dense," he said.

Bill Muir, assistant vice president for community relations at K-State, said there is a possibility of cooperation with K-State on the joint parking garage. "It's an option for the university to consider, but it's just really too early to come to

Kerry criticizes Bush's withdrawal plan

By Ron Fournier
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CINCINNATI — John Kerry, telling fellow combat veterans he's their "true brother in arms," said Wednesday that President Bush's plan to withdraw U.S. troops from Europe and Asia would weaken U.S. security and embolden nuclear-armed North Korea.

"This is clearly the wrong signal to send at the wrong time," the Democratic presidential candidate said at the Veterans of Foreign Wars' 105th annual convention, borrowing a line Bush has used against him.

Some Bush supporters and fellow veterans have raised questions about Kerry's military record, which has been a cornerstone of his presidential campaign.

Senior Democrats inside and outside the campaign say they're worried about indications, some based on polling, that the criticism might be undercutting gains Kerry made against Bush in the Democratic National Convention, with its spotlight on his combat record and military honors from the Vietnam War.

Some Democrats are urging Kerry to fight back against the criticism, which gained steam this month with a TV ad featuring fellow veterans questioning his record. Kerry campaign officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said he may have to do so.

University plans bridge for former K-State provost

By Joanna Rubick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Symbols of teaching and life are represented in the plans for the area where Denison Hall once stood.

Jana Fallin, division chair in music education, said the planned bridge in Coffman Commons represents teaching.

"I have an analogy of teaching that it is like a bridge. A good teacher builds a bridge with the student," Fallin said. "A good teacher helps the student get across that bridge."

Fallin said former Provost James Coffman, whom the commons was named after, was dedicated to making K-State teachers do their best.

"Everybody loved Jim Coffman. He was just such an incredible man," she said. "He was very supportive of teaching excellence."

"He's certainly worth it." Another symbolic aspect of the plan is the location.

"It's in the center of the university. If you went from any edge of campus, it is pretty much in the center," Fallin said. "We want teaching excellence to be central at the university."

The water feature also has symbolic meaning, she said.

"Running water is also kind of symbolic of life," she said. "It's ongoing; it's moving."

The total structure is projected to cost just under $750,000, but officials still are unsure how this money will be raised, said Gerald Carter, director of facility planning and university architect.

Fallin said she is unsure how the project will be funded, but faculty donations have been considered.

"I'm sure it's hanging up on the money," she said. "If we could, we would start it right now."

Students helped in designing, Carter said.

"It was designed internally," he said.

"This project has been an integral part for the master plan for campus."

Carter said plans to tear down Denison Hall began 10 years ago.

"The library is so pretty, and you couldn't even see it before," Fallin said.

Provost Duane Nellis said he is glad people can now see the grandeur of the building when walking around campus.

"It's just absolutely beautiful," he said.

"It gives a sense of how wonderful Hale Library really is. You can see the arches and other architectural features that were hidden."

American tourism in Paris on the rise after difficult year, officials say

By Jamey Keaten
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PARIS — Maybe "freedom fries" taste better in France.

After political squabbles over the Iraq war soured U.S.-French relations, more American tourists are visiting Paris this year, tourism officials say.

Since last year, the diplomatic antagonism has faded. Experts say American tourists are growing less fearful about terrorism. And World War II anniversaries have injected new good feeling into U.S.-French ties.

"The international situation has allowed an increase in Americans visiting Europe _ and we've benefited," said the president of the Paris tourism bureau, Jean-Marc Janailiac.

Paris is not alone. After a rough 2003, Europe is enjoying a rebound in visits by Americans, Japanese and others. Even Spain's terrorism-struck capital, Madrid, has seen more U.S. visitors this year.

Visitor tallies plunged across Europe after the Sept. 11 terror attacks on the United States.

Then came the SARS outbreak in Asia, the invasion of Iraq and the betrayal felt by some Americans toward the French over the war, and 2003 proved a dismal year for Paris tourism.

Now the Yanks are back _ along with many others.

In its latest report, Paris' tourism office said 21 percent more Germans, 18 percent more Japanese and 13 percent more Americans checked into the city's hotels in the first five months of 2004 compared to a year ago.

But free-spending Americans, typically the most represented nationality among visitors in Paris, are the special target of promoters. The French capital has held events tied to the Fourth of July holiday the last two years trying to attract American tourists.

Despite the upswing in American visitors, their numbers are still below those of three years ago.

According to tourism officials, the number of American tourists in France slumped 31 percent from 3.5 million in 2001 to 2.4 million last year.

Some Americans remain reluctant _ even begrudging _ visitors to a country they believe has a strong anti-American tilt.

"I was concerned about coming. ... My travel agent advised against it," Nancy Webber said Wednesday on the Champs-Elysees. "I didn't want to spend money here, but then I thought, 'Well, I drink red wine, and I eat brie.'" this has happened with previous programs similar to SafeRide for which he has provided taxis. "It's going to be grossly abused," he said.

To help prevent this, Puett said Yell-Bell will follow the rules and make no exceptions.

"You don't pick up a person at a resident's place and take them to the bar," he said.

Richard Gibson, managing partner for Taxi-4-Less, said on the nights SafeRide runs, business drops 15 to 20 percent, but this is understandable. "It's just natural students are going to use this service. It's a great idea," he said.

Hayley Urkevich, student body president, said students need to take advantage of this service, because it is provided for them by student privilege fees.

"There's really no excuse ever for drinking and driving," she said.

very devastating disease that is fortunately rare."

Between 10 and 15 percent of those with meningitis will die from it, and another 10 percent are left significantly disabled.

The lasting effects of this disease add to its devastation.

Director of Health Promotion Carol Kennedy said the vaccine is 70 percent effective and lasts three to five years, but only 300 students are vaccinated each year, she said.

As with any vaccination there is a risk of an allergic reaction, but overall the side effects of the vaccine are very mild, Kennedy said.

The shot itself is not very painful, and individuals who receive the vaccine might have redness or slight tenderness where the shot was administered, she said.

The vaccination is $65. Take the opportunity to ensure a happy and healthy future.

they come home."

The three deaths in four days followed a more than three-month span in which only two Fort Riley soldiers were killed.

Sgt. Daniel M. Shepherd, 23, was killed on Sunday near Ar Ramadi when a homemade bomb hit his vehicle. Neil Santoriello, 24, was killed on Friday in Khalidiyah when a bomb exploded near his patrol. Forty-one Fort Riley soldiers have been killed during Operation Iraqi Freedom.

deeds. "We have seen many, many times al-Sadr assume or say he is going to accept certain terms, and then it turns out not to be the case," said Condoleezza Rice, President Bush's national security adviser.

The cease-fire agreement was announced at the National Conference in Baghdad, which had sent a delegation to negotiate with al-Sadr.

The conference spilled into an unscheduled fourth day Wednesday so it could choose members of an interim National Council.

The council is to act as a watchdog over the interim government until elections in January.

Disputes persisted at the conference throughout the day over how to choose 81 elected members of the council, with small parties complaining they were being strong-armed by the large factions into accepting their slate of candidates.

A planned vote to affirm a slate of 81 candidates was called off at the last minute.

The final 19 members of the 100-member council will be members of the former U.S.-appointed Iraqi Governing Council who were left out of the interim government.

Religious groups see rising numbers of students celebrating

Not a seat was empty, and many students were left standing Thursday night at Christian Challenge in the K-State Union Forum Hall.

Christian Challenge is one of the many religious groups on campus, and it has experienced an increase in membership in recent years, Bob Anderson, director of Christian Challenge, said.

"It was a small group of about a dozen in the early '70s," he said. "Last year we averaged over 500."

Anderson said he attributes the increase to numerous reasons.

"We've really sought to see students become leaders. We've helped them grow spiritually," he said. "We do a lot of additional things like retreats and going overseas."

Christian Challenge, though, is not the only religious group on campus to experience growth.

Don Fallon, coordinator of religious activities at K-State, said through discussion with religious groups on campus he found that most groups have seen an increase in numbers.

"More and more students are searching," Fallon said. "There has been a growing interest in religion and Bible studies."

Other religions besides Christianity also are prevalent at K-State.

"We also have a strong interest both on campus and in the community in Jewish religion," Fallon said.

Islam is another religion that has had strong support in the past, so much that a mosque was built in Manhattan, Fallon said.

However, the Muslim Student Association membership have suffered in recent years due to changes following Sept. 11, 2001, Fayeze Hussein, advisor for MSA, said.

Fighters abandon Iraqi shrine

Battles persist in Najaf, Fallujah

By Abdul Hussein Al-Obeidi
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NAJAF, Iraq — Radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr ordered his fighters Thursday to hand control of a revered Najaf shrine to top Shiite religious authorities, hours after U.S. forces bombed militant positions and Iraq's prime minister made a "final call" for the cleric's militia to surrender.

Blasts and gunbattles persisted throughout Thursday in the streets of Najaf, and at least 30 explosions shook the Old City as a U.S. plane hit militant targets east of the Imam Ali shrine.

Earlier, militants bombarded a Najaf police station with mortar rounds, killing seven police and injuring 35 others.

U.S. forces also battled al-Sadr's supporters in a Baghdad slum, where militants said five fighters and five civilians were killed.

Also late Thursday, an American warplane bombed targets in the Sunni city of Fallujah, 40 miles west of Baghdad.

Colleges face tuition hikes for funding

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tuition and state funding both must increase to improve Kansas' institutions of higher education, a group said Thursday.

Recent tuition increases only have begun to equalize rates with other universities, and additional increases are needed, said Bill Hall, founding member of the Citizens for Higher Education.

"If we don't act, Kansas will fall further behind," Hall said.

Hall proposed having increases in tuition coincide with increases in state funding to improve Kansas universities.

Student Body President Hayley Urkevich, who attended the forum, said afterward she was unsure of how much more students could handle.

"We have to be careful with rates of tuition increases," she said. "We are confident our single-digit goals are in line with the administration's."

K-State is in the fourth year of a five-year plan to increase tuition. It is essential to invest now in

District cited for lack of progress

By John Milburn
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Six Wichita schools and the entire district have been added to a statewide list of those failing to make adequate academic progress last year.

The Wichita schools join six districts and 15 schools with a majority of students living in poverty that also failed to make adequate progress. The State Department of Education released its revised list Thursday.

The listed schools are Title I schools, which receive federal money targeted to schools with large numbers of poor students. Other districts' results were available last week, when Wichita and state officials were trying to verify the district's data.

Last year, the Wichita district was not on the list, but four of its schools were included.

Wichita officials said they remained pleased with their district's results because meeting goals for adequate progress is becoming more difficult with each passing year.

That's partly a function of the two-year-old federal No Child Left Behind law, designed to ensure all students are proficient in reading and math by 2014.

"They keep moving the bar up every year," said district spokeswoman Susan Arensman.

Popularity of wireless technology growing

Trend brings convenience, ease to new Internet technology

By Ashley Friesen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State is capitalizing on one of the fastest-growing technological trends: wireless Internet access.

Wireless Internet access is transmitted to personal laptop computers through radio waves.

These radio waves are transmitted through the air from an existing access point at various locations on campus to computers with wireless Internet capabilities.

There are advantages to going wireless, said Rebecca Gould, director of the Information Technology Assistant Center.

"It's mobile computing — anytime, anywhere. It's called untethered, unwired," Gould said.

Daniel Connors, K-State Student Union employee, enjoys having a wireless Internet connection because of its convenience.

"It's convenient," Connors said. "You can just bring your laptop anywhere, you can sit down, and you don't have to worry about cords or anything."

However, there are obstacles that must be overcome when installing wireless access on any campus.

"Since your signal is going through the air, anyone in that air space can potentially intercept that," said Harvard Townsend, director of Computing and Network Services.

However, K-State uses an encryption, or WEP, key to deter hackers and prevent unauthorized use.

Students, faculty and staff access the wireless connection by typing in either a 10-digit/40-bit or 26-digit/128-bit key code.

Depending on the security level the user prefers, they use the more secure 128-bit key or the less secure 40-bit key, said

Elaine Chen and Bo Yang, graduate students in educational design, computer and telecommunications, use Chen's computer to access wireless Internet. The two were studying Wednesday afternoon in Hale Library.

Dan Barnes, Union Computer Store sales associate.

"WEP keys are not the most secure way to encrypt data, but it is a better-than-nothing scenario," Townsend said.

Because WEP keys do not guarantee an entirely secure access, CNS is devising a more secure solution.

"This year we're working on alternatives that provide better security and require people to use their eID and password before connecting to the wireless system," Townsend said.

"It allows us to better ensure that it's only K-State students and faculty and staff that are able to use the connection."

Despite security issues, the wireless trend is popular, and the Union Computer Store is bustling with students who are looking to outfit their computers with the necessary equipment to go wireless.

"Buy a wireless PCMCIA card and install that or a USB wireless adaptor, and that plugs into the USB port," Barnes said.

USB is desktop and laptop compatible, PCMCIA is laptop compatible and PCI cards are directly installed in the computer, Barnes added.

Following the installation of the first access point at K-State in 1999, the number of access points has grown exponentially every year since, Townsend said.

"As of the end of last spring, we had 172 access points. I'm sure this fall we'll hit 200," Townsend said.

"The ultimate goal is to have every square foot of campus, indoor and out, connected."

Students should brace for added tuition increases

Students might have to bear the cost once again for a lack of university funding.

At a forum Thursday aimed at examining solutions to the years of budget shortfalls, officials discussed increased state funding as well as more tuition increases.

While we hope the Kansas legislature restructures its priorities and realizes that students cannot bear the burden much longer, this isn't likely to happen. Social programs and a K-12 education budget crisis have stretched the state's money thin.

Therefore, students should begin to prepare themselves for more tuition hikes in order to assure K-State maintains a high level of quality education. Although the five-year tuition plan is nearing its end, those promises of only inflationary increases might be broken.

Even with additional increases, K-State is relatively inexpensive when compared nationwide. It's a burden on students' bank accounts when tuition increases, but sacrificing a quality degree is not a burden we are willing to bear.

K-State must continue its tradition of academic excellence, and if this means a tuition hike is necessary, so be it. Students will reap the educational benefits long after they pay their tuition.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Making a difference

Political involvement proves rewarding

Illustrations by Jeff Yeung | COLLEGIAN

It's that time again, kids – an election year is upon us.

Every four years, election night rears its bipartisan head, and this year Americans must choose between one wealthy, white male from Yale and another.

But we have a choice – either be vocal and involved in the democratic process, or sit aside and watch as the proverbial parade passes us by.

I say we should be involved. It isn't a new concept, you understand, but it is something that you should ponder during the next few minutes as you peruse the rest of the paper.

For instance...In the 1930s the New York Branch of the American Communist Party distributed a 15-page pamphlet on the correct way to "Give a Party for the Party" – those crazy reds and their incessant need for merrymaking.

Inside the reader finds suggestions for what to serve, where to host your gathering and even what parlor games to play. I mean, come on – who doesn't want to be the guy designated to dress up like Benito Mussolini?

The greatest part of this clearly educational pamphlet was the zeal with which it was put together. You can knock the Communists for a thousand different reasons, but not for their lack of enthusiasm for their cause.

There seems to be a lack of good, old-fashioned caring about the election or the democratic process.

Whether you're a Republican, Democrat, Green, or one of the few who show support for underdogs like Pogo the Possum or Joe Camel, the least you can do for your candidate or party is to be involved.

Hence: throwing a party for your party.

I'm not saying you have to run out and buy red, white and blue banners or invest in inflatable donkeys and elephants for your next keg party. You don't have to donate tons of money or time to your candidate.

Simply put, just do something.

Get out there and state your opinion. What else is college for? Find others like you, or even not like you, and hold discussions. It is just as fun to spar with those on the opposite side of the political spectrum than to hold lengthy dialogues with those on your own side.

But most importantly, register to vote if you haven't.

Hell, just getting yourself and your five closest friends to register to vote would be about as much as anyone can ask of you. After all, we are the most influential group of voters in any election.

Did you know that 287,000 18-24 year olds were eligible to vote for the 2000 presidential elections?

We are the adult age group most likely to live in poverty and lack health insurance. We vote the least, and this is not a coincidence.

Some non-Republicans cop out with an excuse like, "my vote wouldn't make a difference in Republican-controlled Kansas."

But need I remind you that there are plenty of Democrats in this great state. After all, we recently elected a female Democratic governor for the second time in less than two decades.

A recent Wichita Eagle poll stated that Bush only leads Kerry in Kansas 52 percent to 44 percent, which is within the margin of error for the poll. That means they could be closer to a tie.

No more excuses – register and vote.

Mark your calendars for Oct. 18, because voter registration in Kansas needs to be postmarked 15 days before the election.

You don't have to be president of the Young Democrats or College Republicans on campus to show your party or candidate your support.

And if it takes a little alcohol and party favors to get everyone involved and interested in the political process, do red and blue Jell-O shots, don your favorite political pachyderm, and throw a party for your party.

K-State white pages make students easy prey

LETA REPPERT

Once upon a time on a campus much like ours (in fact, it was ours), a guy and a girl met at a party.

After saying goodbye, the young man realized that he didn't know her phone number or her last name. And unlike Cinderella, she didn't leave behind any glass slippers.

Fortunately for our Prince Charming, he remembered her home town and her father's profession, and armed with this knowledge and the help of the Internet, he soon discovered her last name.

Then, thanks to the K-State Web site, where he typed her name into the search bar and was able to find her phone number, home address and school address.

He gave her a call and detailed the arduous process he had gone through to talk to her once more. Her reply? "That's kind of weird. Don't ever call me again."

And so our story comes to a close with less than a fairy-tale ending.

But the ending could have been much worse. After all, our would-be Prince Charming now knew where Cinderella and her parents lived.

If Prince Charming had been a less reputable character, our fairy tale might have turned into a nightmare, courtesy of the K-State white pages.

This system, known as the "stalker network," provides home and school addresses and phone numbers because it is "considered directory information" by the university.

K-State's Student Records Policy states that "date and place of birth, photograph or likeness, ..., enrollment status (full/part-time), classification, dates of attendance at Kansas State University, awards and academic honors, degrees and dates awarded, most recent previous educational institution attended," and more are "directory information" and are "considered to be open to the public upon inquiry."

Surely with the frequency of violence against women, and especially in light of the rapes committed in Manhattan this summer, it is time to reconsider whether we really want everyone to be able to access so much information so easily.

Obviously, being able to find information online comes in handy, there's a reason the system is called "stalkernet." It is entirely too easy to find out too much information about other students.

The university will remove this information from public view upon request, but only if the student completes a non-disclosure hold form, available from the Registrar's office.

The form must be submitted within "15 calendar days from the beginning of the semester," (Sept. 7 this year) to ensure that this information does not appear in the Campus Phone Book, as noted by the registrar's office's Web site.

If a stalker, ex-girlfriend or overzealous admirer pops up after that period, then you're out of luck.

And while submitting the form may protect your privacy, it has negative effects as well.

The K-State Registrar's Office Web site warns students to "consider carefully the consequences ... as any future requests for such information will be refused."

As it was explained to me when I went to the Registrar's office to complete the form, this means if a company to which I have applied contacts K-State to verify my student status, the university will not affirm I am a student here.

Since I have completed the form, I have searched for my name on the "stalker network" and found no matches. It is as if I were no longer a student.

Surely this is a bit excessive. I just want my address and home phone number removed from the Internet and phone book; I am not trying to hide the fact that I attend K-State. If I were, I doubt I would be writing for the Collegian.

Why is such a policy in place? It is helpful to be able to easily find contact information for friends or classmates, but there should be a way for students to choose what information is posted.

K-State's policy needs to be changed. Students need to be able to remove their addresses and phone numbers from the Internet while still having the university acknowledge their attendance.

In the meantime, look for me in the Collegian. I won't be in the white pages.

PERSPECTIVES

Kerry's promises contradict candidate's lavish lifestyle

By Cassandra Showell
OKLAHOMA DAILY (U. OF OKLAHOMA)

NORMAN, Okla. - If Sen. John Kerry and Sen. John Edwards pull off a win, it'll be the single greatest miracle that modern-American politics have seen.

The self-proclaimed party of the Little Guy has put together the wealthiest presidential ticket ever. Franklin Roosevelt and John F. Kennedy were certainly up there, but even they couldn't match the five-mansion, private jet, $8,600 bike-lifestyle of Mr. Forbes Kerry.

To be sure, President George W. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney are not paupers. Bush used his father's connections to pave his way in the business world, earning his $18 million fortune largely through the sale of his stake in a pro baseball team.

Cheney toiled years on a government salary before entering the private sector, wherein contacts and acquaintances from his administration days made him $50 million that would otherwise have been difficult to come by.

That ties him with Edwards, who made his $50 million by litigating dubious claims against obstetricians who allegedly caused cerebral palsy in babies by not performing early cesarean sections.

But one can only guess what Kerry is really worth - rather, what his wife is worth.

Bush's upbringing may have been just as privileged as Kerry's, but he did exert a bit more effort in pursuit of his current fortune than Kerry presumably did in saying "I do" to Teresa.

A billion dollars is a lot of money.

Perhaps that's why Kerry professes to be concerned the government is not spending enough billions. Try as he may to soften it, Kerry is beyond doubt as tax-and-spend as a liberal gets.

Some of his spending is defensible and even admirable - his GROW initiative to attract business capital to rural America has promise, for instance. But the man from Taxachusetts, though he runs rightward, is still the most liberal senator.

Kerry promises tax cuts, deficit cuts, huge spending increases and a growing economy, but has never given a clear picture as to whose piggy bank will be raided for the occasion.

Perhaps he'll repeal Bush's dastardly tax cuts for the rich. Has a nice populist ring to it, but if Kerry and Edwards themselves are any example, the rich never needed the tax cuts in the first place.

Edwards only claims a few hundred thousand per year as his actual salary; the rest of his earnings are "corporate dividends" collected through a corporation set up with, conveniently enough, himself as the sole shareholder. This shelters 90 percent of his income from being subject to Medicare taxes - over half a million in Edwards' pocket that could have brought hope to those Little Guys Edwards claims to care for so deeply. As schemes go, Edwards' is marginally legal, though the IRS has successfully litigated similar cases.

Big money in politics is nothing new. But I'd rather Kerry paid the fair share of taxes on his billion before being so free with my much more well-earned wealth.

GRANT REICHERT

Wow, it's great to be back together again! You're a little heavier, but that just means there's more to love!

It's been a long summer. I've got so much stuff to tell you that it's literally running down my leg.

First, a quick, one-sentence primer to get you up to speed about what happened politically this summer.

It's only one sentence, I promise.

President Bush tried to ban abortions for gay Iraqi couples, while John Kerry vowed to send more troops to Vietnam; Michael Moore is fat.

Sorry about the semi-colon. That's a cheap partisan trick we right-wingers like to use; we're devious that way.

John Kerry also just finished his "Simple Life" tour with rich heiress Paris Hilt ... er... Teresa Heinz Kerry.

It was great fun watching these bluebloods travel across the country and mix with the common person, whether it was John brandishing corn ears like ground-control batons, or Teresa unable to identify a bowl of chili at Wendy's.

At a deeper level of life mimicking reality TV (or is it the other way round?), Kerry whored out his political ideology by shamelessly demagoguing stem cell research and outsourcing in order to win votes, not unlike Nicole Richie flaunting her body to pay for gas.

Meanwhile, Bush had his own Christian Revival Tour going, where he shook some hands, gave some sermons and cured elderly people's varicose veins.

I say to you, demon, be gone - SMACK! I didn't pay much attention, because news coverage was always on at night, and party loyalty stops when "The Simpsons" begins.

My own political views also underwent some changes this summer, getting all fluxed up by a couple of movies.

After seeing "Troy" (starring a skirted Brad Pitt), I became rabidly pro-gay marriage. You know, because ... ah ... umm ... equal rights for all, and ...

umm... why is he with that hussy Jennifer Aniston anyway?

Later on in the summer, my views changed once again. After viewing the agit-propumentary "Fahrenheit 9/11," starring the aesthetically challenged Moore, my views on gay marriage were moderated, and I nearly was rendered impotent in the process. Dude, there's nothing in the Patriot Act that prevents good personal hygiene.

Then the Democratic Convention came along. The message was, "we're chock full of patriotism, if by patriotism you mean balloons, confetti and the band Black Eyed Peas."

At the convention, the Democrats unveiled the three major issues they wanted to focus on: Vietnam, Vietnam, and Iraq - and by Iraq, I mean Vietnam.

The whole thing was like a bad acid flashback to the 1960s, where things seemed kind of normal, but in a Bizarro-world sort of way. Nary a mention of Bushitler, while Democrats instead extolled the necessity of being a decorated Vietnam veteran in order to become president. Moore stalked the convention grounds like a rogue elephant in heat, while protesters outside were confined to a virtual detainment camp, minus the usual pleasant ethnic solidarity.

Kerry then gave a speech nearly as long as his face. Never has so little been said with so many words. In fairness, though, the speech could end up serving as a practical tool for his health care plan. Loop it, and you could use the speech to euthanize the elderly or even disperse rioting crowds.

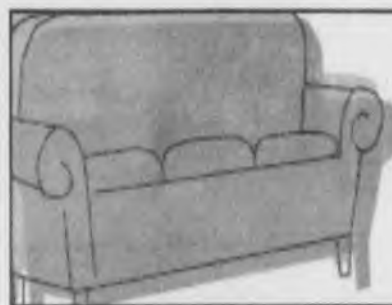

It's probably no surprise that the post-convention polls bounced like a wet turd off a 10-story building.

And with that disturbing simile you are officially up to speed. If not past speed. Heck, if I gave you any more political-crack, you'd start experiencing the Democratic Convention all over again.

Really, it's great to see you again, even if you ... you know ... "more to love."

Let's never fight again.

Olympics more than a game for Iraqi soccer team

For the Iraqi soccer team, it could've been the end of the world.

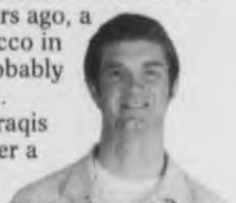

Two short years ago, a 2-1 loss to Morocco in the Olympics probably would have been.

You see, the Iraqis used to play under a regime that didn't exactly pamper its athletes. Back when Saddam Hussein was in control, his son, Odai, was in charge of the country's Olympic committee.

It is suspected Odai's methods for "motivating" athletes sometimes included torture. So when it came to sports, failure really wasn't an option.

And Team USA athletes think they're under pressure to perform.

Saddam and Odai are both gone now and the Iraqi soccer players can take the field without fear of what they would face if they lose.

KENT HILDEBRAND

Even then, for these Iraqis just to reach the Olympics has been nothing short of miraculous.

Iraq wasn't reinstated by the International Olympic Committee until the start of the year, and the soccer team was given little chance to qualify for the Games.

Then, in May, a team short on resources but long on determination shocked the world for the first time by clinching a spot in the Olympics.

They weren't finished. As if it wasn't enough to rise up amid the turbulence of their war-torn country, in July the Iraqis found themselves without a coach.

Bernd Stange, the team's coach from Germany, resigned citing safety concerns. Former national team member Adnan Hamad took his place, and the team headed to Athens without much hope of being anything more than also-rans.

What happened next may go down with the likes of the 1980 United States hockey team and the Jamaican bobsledders.

In their first match of pool play, the Iraqis came from behind to beat Portugal 4-2. In their second match they knocked off Costa Rica 2-0.

Even after their loss to Morocco, the Iraqis won their pool with a 2-1 record. Now they advance to the quarterfinals where they will play Australia on Saturday.

After the win over Portugal, Iraqi player Abdul Wahab said, "It's very important for us to have won this first game. We hope to give more satisfaction to our people who need happiness."

Though we Americans are in no dire need of happiness, imagine those words coming out of Allen Iverson's mouth. Or Carmelo Anthony's. Or Lamar Odom's. Or ... You get the picture.

For these soccer players, competing in the Olympics is more than just a break from their day job.

Any endorsement deals or other incentives don't really matter.

Even winning and losing doesn't matter. What matters right now is they represent one bright spot of hope for their country.

The Iraqis still are a long shot for a medal. And when they return home, what little fanfare they receive will be against the backdrop of a nation still ravaged by daily violence.

But there's no doubt they will return bringing with them pride, a precious gift to a nation finding a new identity.

For the Iraqis, losing to Morocco wasn't the end of the world. That happened about a year and a half ago. For them, it was just part of building a new one.

Club sports give students chance for involvement, tuning athletic abilities

By Kelly Olson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For students seeking athletic opportunities outside of intramurals, club sports may be the answer. Players and coaches from a variety of club sports are ready to accept new members as the new school year begins.

Nate Heckerson, vice president and co-captain of the waterski club, said the sport is a fun way to get involved.

Heckerson, senior in biology, said K-State students should find something new and interesting to them.

"We are a competitive team, but we still have a lot of fun. Our sport allows for many different interests and ability levels," he said.

The club meets at 9 p.m. Mondays in Union 207, and anyone is welcome to join.

"We have all levels of athletes from beginner to expert. We also have three different events, so there is always a variety of things to try," Heckerson said.

Another way to get your feet wet in club sports is to join the sailing club.

Fifth-year senior in biology and team junior skipper Richard Brusk said he joined when he saw a chalked sidewalk promoting the club and decided to go to the new-member meeting.

"I went, I saw and I joined," he said.

Club membership costs $20 per semester, and students can come try out before committing.

Richard Baker, K-State Radio Network news director and women's club softball coach, said the team is a great way to get involved and welcomes new players.

Although K-State is just one of two Big 12 schools who do not compete in softball, the team competes against other universities, community

Jess Ervin, senior in advertising, practices skiing last September at Tuttle Creek Reservoir for the water ski club. Many club sports are beginning for the fall semester.

Rovelto coaching Olympic track Coach helping jumper

By Kent Hildebrand
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Track and field coach Cliff Rovelto is far from his office in Ahearn Field House.

Instead of being on campus, Rovelto is pushing athletes to make their Olympic dreams a reality.

Rovelto is at the Olympic Games in Athens, Greece, coaching former K-State assistant coach Shelia Burrell in the heptathlon and high jumper Jamie Nieto.

Both begin competing in their respective events today.

Rovelto coached athletes in the Sydney Games in 2000 and in Atlanta in 1996.

Those athletes included former K-State high jumpers Ed Broxterman, Nathan Leeper and Rovelto's wife, Karol, and current assistant track and field coach Steve Fritz, who competed in the decathlon at Atlanta.

Cross country and assistant track coach Michael Smith said Rovelto's years of working with rising track stars has been invaluable to the athletes he coaches.

"He's got a number of years of experience behind him at the collegiate level," Smith said.

"In all those years, he has had the opportunity to work with some talented people that have gone to the Olympics. Through coaching them, he has experience at that level, too."

Beard sets Olympic record

ATHENS, Greece — American Amanda Beard won her first individual Olympic gold medal Thursday night, holding off Australian Leisel Jones in the 200-meter breaststroke.

Beard won in an Olympic-record time of 2 minutes, 23.37 seconds — 0.23 seconds better than Jones, who was under world-record pace for the first 150 meters.

Patterson wins gold

ATHENS, Greece — Sorry, Svetlana. There's a new Queen of Gymnastics, and her name is Carly Patterson.

The 16-year-old American who drew comparisons to Mary Lou Retton delivered a dazzling routine on the floor to win the all-around gold Thursday night and spoil Russian superstar Svetlana Khorkina's final chance at the Olympic title in gymnastics' premier event.

U.S. beats Australia by 10

ATHENS, Greece — LeBron James eyed Shawn Marion's pass coming toward him and made a split-second decision to redirect the ball. One nifty touch pass later, Dwyane Wade converted it into a layup.

The basket broke the last tie and began a game-changing 10-0 run at the start of the fourth quarter, leading the Americans to a 89-79 victory over Australia on Thursday at the Athens Games.

K-State faculty, students lend their acting talents to Shakespearean tragic comedy

By Christin E. Kuchem
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"The Winter's Tale" is a serious tragedy – until the second half of the play when a live sheep gets sheared.

K-State English professors are teaming up with thespians to continue the performance of "The Winter's Tale" this weekend at the Manhattan Arts Center, said Brady Miller, program and marketing director for the center.

"The play is the lesser known of Shakespeare's tragic comedies," Miller said.

The play begins as a tragedy, as jealousy unfolds between two old friends – Leontes, the king of Sicilia, and Polixenes, the king of Bohemia. In this feud, the Sicilian king's wife, Hermione, awaits a trial where her fidelity is at question.

Don Hedrick, who teaches an introductory Shakespeare course, brings much enthusiasm and knowledge to the stage as first-time director.

The cast is made up of Manhattan community volunteers, Hedrick said.

"Most are either Manhattan High or K-State students," Hedrick said.

Playing the role of King Leontes is Hedrick's colleague, K-State English professor Michael Donnelly. Donnelly said this is an entertaining performance of the play.

"Shakespeare was written to be performed," Donnelly said. "The way it was meant to be was to stage it."

"It's not going to be academic. The first half is high-strung melodrama. The second half is a comedy with a high-strung, free-wheeling effect."

Donnelly said the second half of the play turns into a colorful and vibrant comedy that includes a sheep from the K-State farm being sheared.

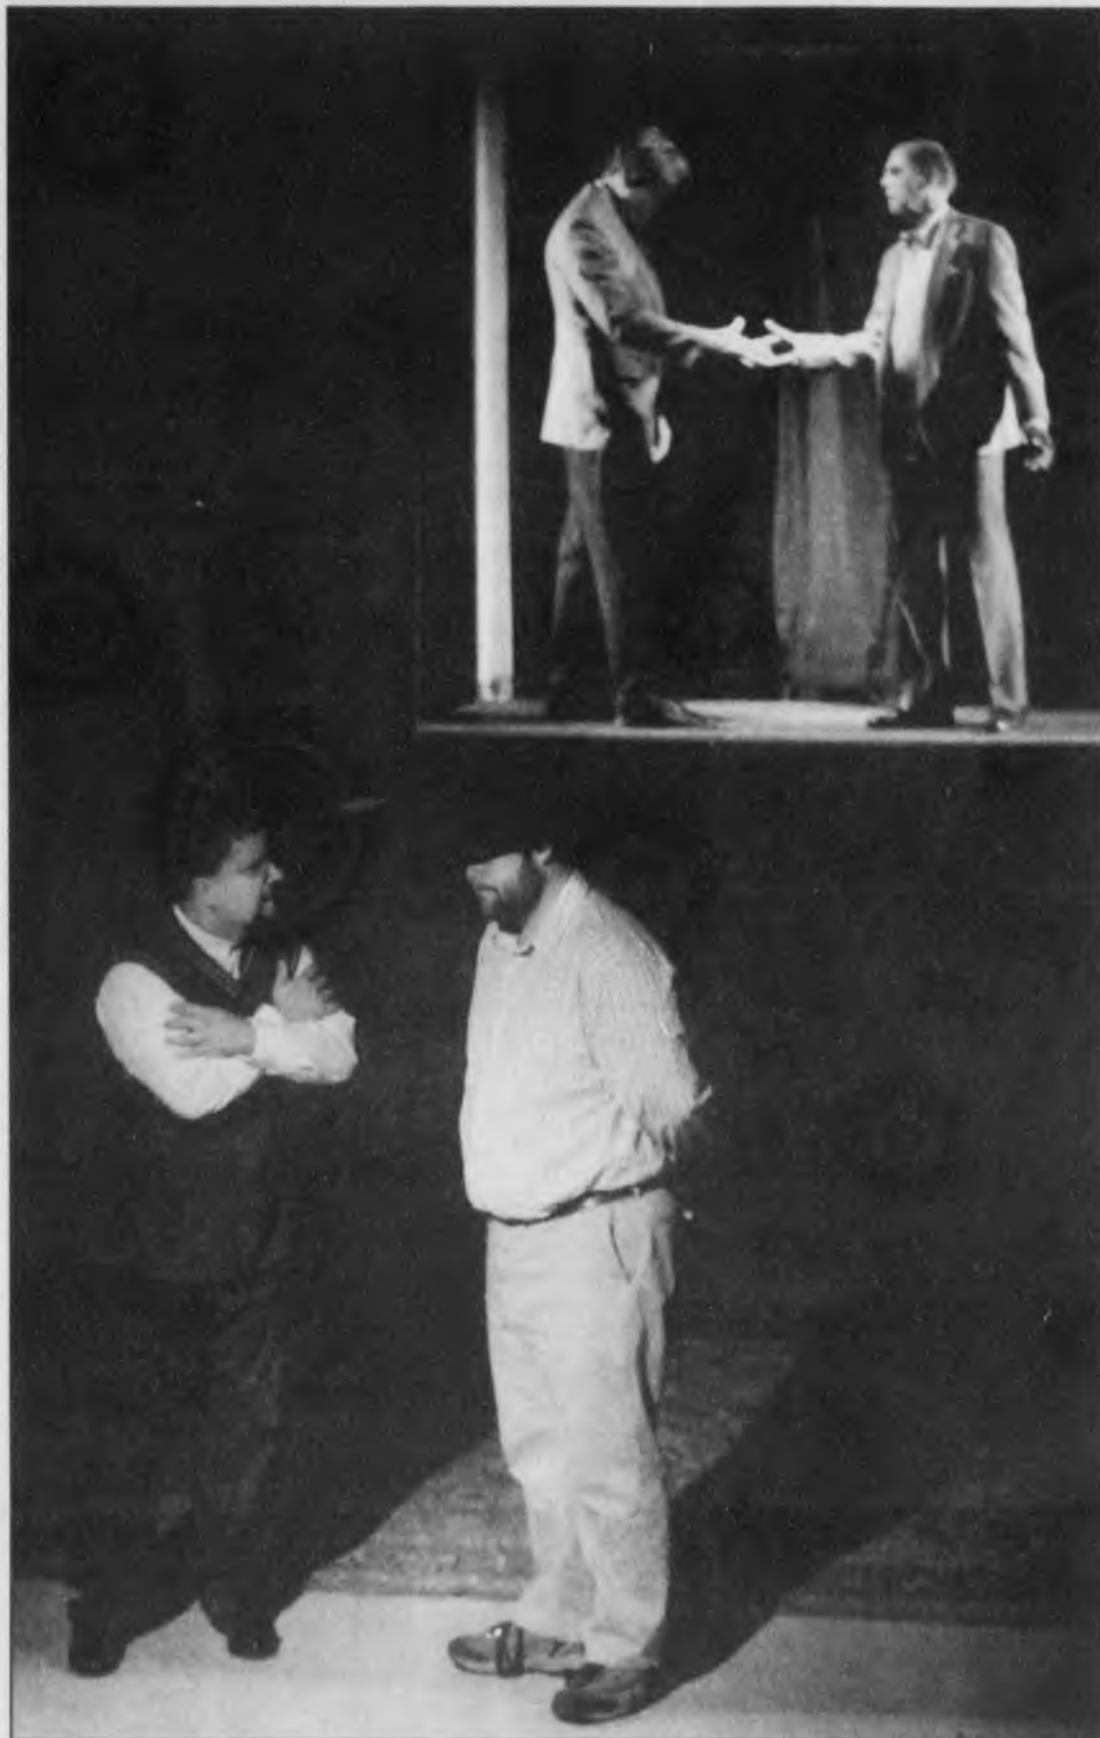

Randy Dykstra, student in theater, said he transferred from Northern Michigan University and is pleased with the diversity and quality of performances offered at the Center.

"It's a very open stage," Dykstra said. "It's nice to have so many things going on all the time."

Dykstra said the music used in the performance is eclectic and enhances the performance.

"We've got country," Dykstra said. "We've got classical. There is a wide variety of different sounds. The music really blended to the strength of the show."

"The country music going on as a bear chases a man – it's a riot."

Shyamalan's latest a must-see despite mixed responses

"The Village"

Movie review by Tanni Chaudhuri

"The Village" evokes mixed responses. For those who are into M. Night Shyamalan for eerie storylines, you might be surprised in the end.

At the end of the film, the audience should be distinctly divided into three camps – those that absolutely love it, totally hate it or those who sit wondering, "What was that all about?"

The movie showcases a 19th century village in middle America, where people are living a simple and sweet lifestyle. People look content in the semi-pastoral setting apart from the threat of the surrounding woods.

This landlocked island of fear and simplicity thus is shielded from any touch of civilization, because making it even to the nearby town means crossing forbidden lands.

As the legend runs, men and the creatures have a truce, whereby they respect each other's territories. The creatures break the truce to warn the humans; for the humans who like to live, breaking the understanding is not an option.

Shyamalan is a master storyteller. His films always have a powerful star cast, and Joaquin Phoenix, Adrien Brody, Bryce Dallas Howard are all fundamental to the narrative this time.

Phoenix stars as the silent, adventurous Lucius who has two passions in life: the beautiful Ivy (Howard) and to venture past the woods.

Brody stars as the mentally challenged and playful Noah, who also is in love with Ivy. When Noah's violent hatred puts Lucius' life in danger, Ivy must cross the forbidden woods and defy the creatures to get medicines for the one she loves.

And thus the climax.

Joaquin Phoenix stars as Lucius in "The Village."

The cinematography, photographed by Roger Deakins, follows a clever color scheme. A touch of the "forbidden" color red (which allures the creatures) is used between the predominant shades of pastel green, yellow and white. The discerning use of sound augments the creepy and empowering character of the surrounding woods.

The characters all have heavy accents and use verbose

English, which is befitting to their characters. Phoenix's speech gives his character an unmistakable maturity, and Brody almost is astounding as the aberrant Noah.

Howard is refreshing and convincing in her depiction of the innocent yet resolute Ivy. William Hurt and Sigourney Weaver, who featured in two important roles, add to the compelling mystery.

Shyamalan's signature is his cerebral and scary storylines, and sometimes that is a disturbing blend. If all you are trying to derive out of the cinematic experience is sheer excitement, you could be disappointed. The almost unexpected and somewhat un-eclectic closure kills the thrill. But it leaves traces of far more important questions about life.

If we look into the sub-cultures that constitute the American fabric, "The Village" is not that far from reality. I am not sure whether that is what makes it more mundane, but the film is a must-see for all.

Google stock IPO nets billions

By Matthew Fordahl
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SAN JOSE, Calif. — Shares of Google Inc. surged nearly 22 percent in their market debut Thursday, culminating a unique and bumpy initial stock offering for the 6-year-old dot-com dreamed up in a college dormitory.

The search engine's stock started at $100.01 on the Nasdaq Stock Market, $15.01 higher than its $85 initial offering price. Within a few minutes of trading, Google was at $103.42, with 12.7 million shares having changed hands.

The IPO price, set late Wednesday through an unorthodox auction that alienated many on Wall Street, cleared the way for the stock to start trading under the symbol "GOOG." Founders Sergey Brin and Larry Page opened trading on the Nasdaq, and Google began trading at midday.

Nasdaq officials said a delay in trading was standard for IPOs, and added that there were some technical issues as the Nasdaq matched bid and ask prices in the minutes leading up to trading.

The surge may indicate that many institutional investors watched sat out the initial offering, said Barry Randall, portfolio manager for the First American Technology Fund.

"There were a lot of institutional investors who were spooked by not only the initial auction scenario but also the missteps along the way," he said. "I suspect many of them did regard it as a healthy business model, and now they have the ability to purchase the stock from the open market instead of the managers."

The $85 initial share price was short of Google's original expectation of $108 to $135 a share. It also came at the lowest end of Google's downward-revised range it issued Wednesday, when it also reduced the number of shares to be sold to 19.6 million from 25.7 million — a move expected to buoy prices.

"The good news for Google is that it didn't price below the low end," said Tom Taulli, co-founder of CurrentOfferings, an IPO research company. If it had, he said, "maybe there could have been some selling pressure."

The IPO raised $1.67 billion. If the stock had priced at the high end of the original estimate, Google would have raised as much as $3.6 billion and given the company a market capitalization as high as $36 billion.

According to Google, pre-IPO shareholders expected to sell 5.5 million shares, less than half the 11.6 million originally planned.

The company itself sold 14.1 million shares, as originally estimated, putting $1.16 billion into its coffers.

The offering eclipses most of the hot tech issues of the 1990s and makes Brin and Page billionaire — at least on paper. Page collected $41.1 million and Brin got $40.9 million, and each still holds more than $3 billion in Google shares.

The $85 price values the world's most popular search engine at $23.1 billion, more valuable than companies such as Amazon.com, with a market capitalization of $16 billion, and Lucent Technologies, valued at $13.5 billion, and nearly as much as General Motors' $23.7 billion.

The company eschewed Wall Street tradition and decided that the final IPO price would be set by an auction.

The company's founders wrote an idealistic letter in its prospectus, outlining a "Don't Be Evil" mantra and a plan to avoid the trappings of traditional companies.

But the road to the IPO was rough.

In one case, Google said the Securities and Exchange Commission "has requested additional information" after an interview with Brin and Page appeared in September's issue of Playboy magazine. The piece potentially violated SEC rules against talking publicly before an IPO about information not included in the prospectus.

The agency has also launched an informal inquiry into Google's issuance of millions of pre-IPO shares and options without registering them, the company has said.

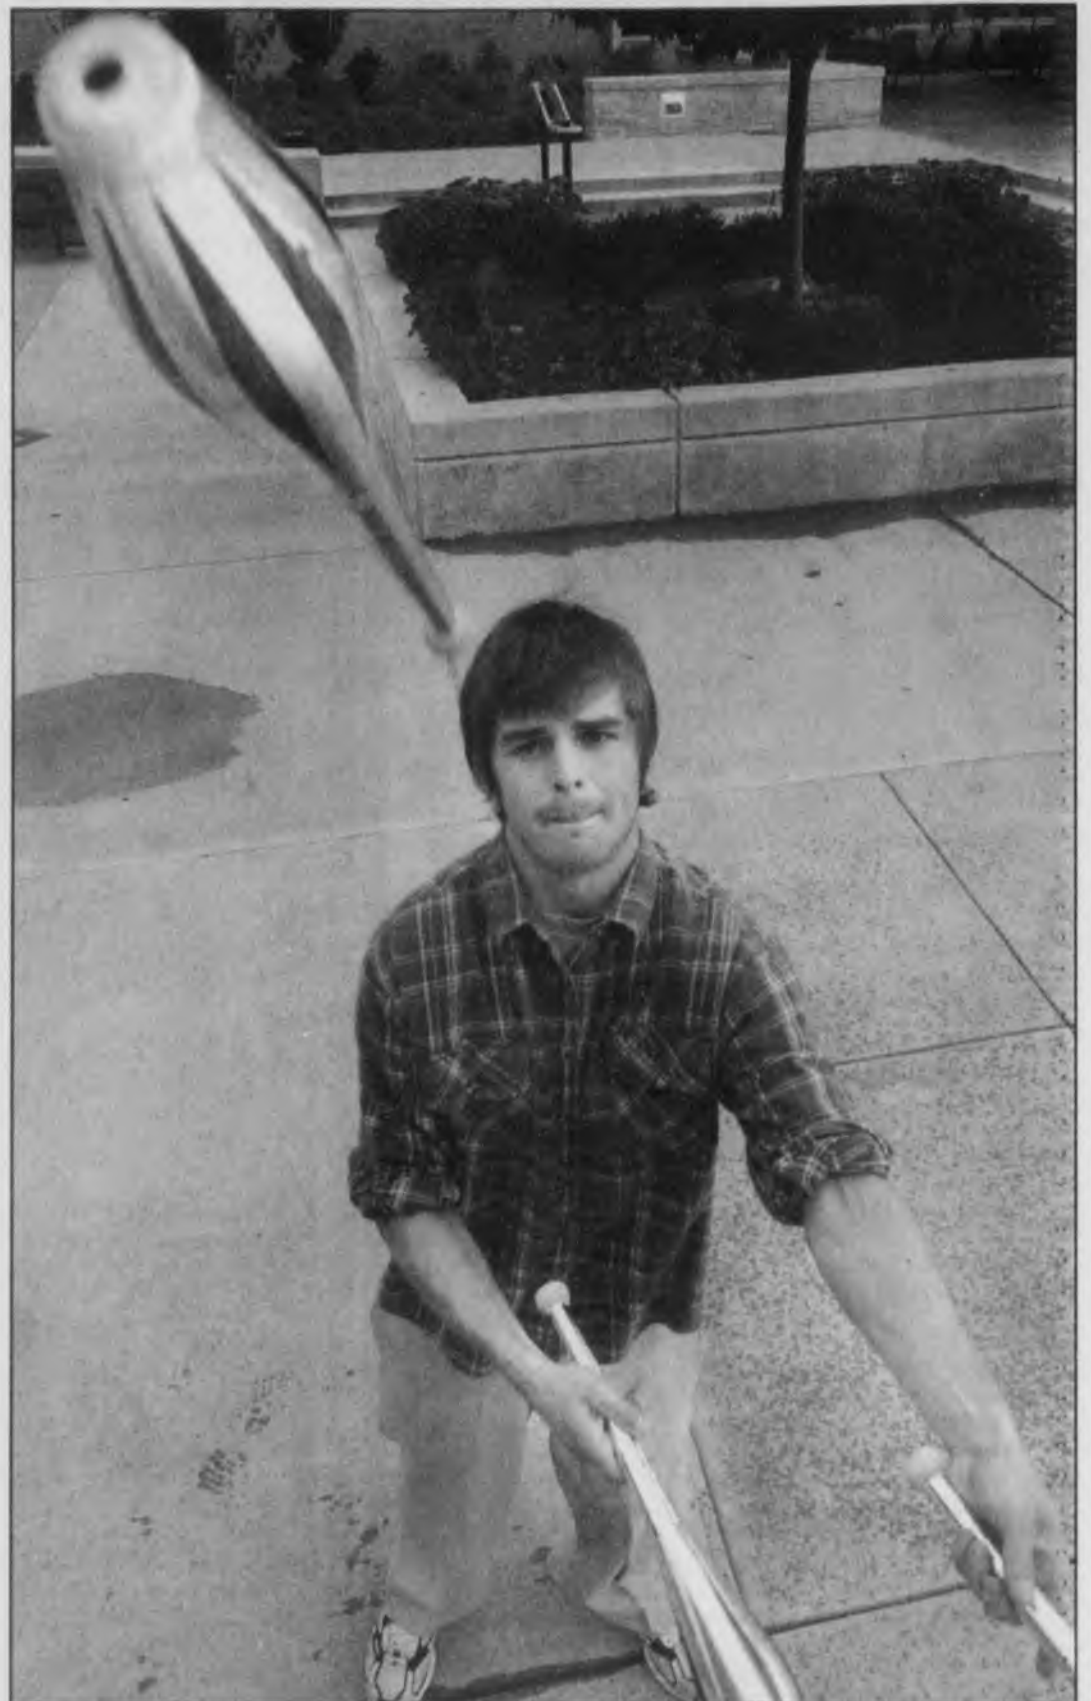

But few deny that Google is popular and prosperous.

Since it was founded in 1998, it always has been something of an oddball.

Its design has no flashy ads, instead using a simple, quick-loading layout. Its search algorithm out-powers rivals. Its name became synonymous with Internet search.

The Mountain View, Calif.-based company, which makes money by selling text advertising, managed to prosper as a private company even while other dot-coms were collapsing. Now, as the technology industry is just recovering, Google stands to prosper even more.

Kerry pushes war service debate

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — John Kerry fought back Thursday against campaign allegations that he exaggerated his combat record in Vietnam, accusing President Bush of using a Republican front group "to do his dirty work" and challenging Bush to debate their wartime service records.

"Well, if he wants to have a debate about our service in Vietnam, here is my answer: Bring it on," said the Democratic presidential candidate, reviving an old war and campaign slogan amid strong urging from party leaders for him to respond to two-week-old GOP assertions.

As Kerry denounced the criticism as "lies about my record," aides privately acknowledged that they and their boss had been slow to recognize the damage being done to his political standing.

Kerry won three Purple Hearts, a Bronze Star and Silver Star for Vietnam War combat. Bush served stateside in the Texas Air National Guard. Both men say the other served honorably, but their supporters are pouring tens of thousands of dollars into television ads and other tactics to insist otherwise.

MoveOn.org, a liberal group funded by Kerry supporters, is airing an ad accusing Bush of using family connections to avoid the Vietnam War. It also asks the president to denounce an ad that aired early this month by "Swift Boat Veterans for Truth," a GOP-leaning group of Vietnam veterans who say Kerry exaggerated his actions to win Vietnam War medals.

Bush campaign spokesman Steve Schmidt said the charge that Bush was in league with the group criticizing Kerry's war record "is absolutely and completely false. The Bush campaign has never and will never question John Kerry's service in Vietnam."

Party ban in Israel may affect pullout

By Mark Lavie
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said Thursday that he would push ahead with a withdrawal from the Gaza Strip despite a stinging setback to the plan from his Likud Party.

A Likud convention voted overwhelmingly late Wednesday to bar Sharon from inviting the opposition Labor Party into the government.

Although Sharon insisted the vote wasn't binding, it could endanger the pullout, which he hopes to complete next year. Sharon is courting Labor to shore up support in parliament for the withdrawal plan.

Meanwhile, Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat rebuffed the latest challenge to his authority, refusing to sign anti-corruption legislation demanded by lawmakers.

In a speech to parliament, Arafat admitted Wednesday to making "mistakes" and pledged to clean up the Palestinian Authority.

But in a "stormy and tense" follow-up meeting late Wednesday, Arafat told pro-reform lawmakers "that his speech ... was enough and that there is no need for any signatures," said Azmi Shouabi, one of the meeting's participants.

Shouabi said the lawmakers had agreed to meet with Arafat one more time before submitting a report to parliament next week.

Arafat has been under intense local and international pressure to reform his government and relinquish some of his powers, but has repeatedly balked.

Although Arafat does not appear to be in danger of being overthrown, the public criticism has reached an unprecedented level.

Sharon is facing his own internal challenges, due to strong opposition within his party to his plan to pull out of the entire Gaza Strip and four West Bank settlements next year. Sharon says the moves are necessary to boost Israel's security and preserve its Jewish majority.

Nir Elias | REUTERS

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon gestures during a convention of his Likud party Wednesday in Tel Aviv. Sharon fought on Wednesday to avoid an embarrassing defeat in a Likud Party vote by rebels opposed to his plan to withdraw from the occupied Gaza Strip. Violence has surged in Gaza in anticipation of a U.S.-backed pullout and five Palestinians were killed Wednesday in a failed Israeli attempt to assassinate a leader of the Islamic militant group Hamas.

The Likud convention vote Wednesday wasn't close, with 60 percent in favor of banning Labor from the government. Hard-line Likud members oppose an alliance with Labor, fearing further concessions to the Palestinians.

The vote was Sharon's second major setback from the party. In May, a nonbinding Likud referendum rejected the withdrawal plan by a 60-40 margin.

In his first public reaction to the vote, Sharon's office said Thursday that "the prime minister is determined to continue with the disengagement plan and the diplomatic process and he will try to build a stable coalition."

A government official, speaking on condition of anonymity, refused to say whether Sharon would continue talks with Labor. The prime minister could also seek smaller religious parties to bolster his coalition.

Sharon, who has lost his parliamentary majority because of the plan, opened negotiations with Labor leader Shimon Peres last month. He will need parliamentary and Cabinet approval for the plan in the coming months in order to proceed.

The Likud vote, however, could stall or even scuttle those efforts. Sharon will find it hard to muster a parliamentary majority without Labor.

Opponents warned following the vote, Sharon would not be able to approach Labor now.

"Sharon cannot ignore the wishes of his party," said Likud lawmaker Michael Ratzon.

Labor denounced the results, saying Likud had become "a movement that destroys all chances to bring about an end to violence in the region."

The Labor statement said "elections must be called immediately."

After a meeting of Labor negotiators Thursday, lawmaker Amram Mitzna told Army Radio that the party would prepare for elections, although it remains open to continuing talks with Sharon.

Labor favors Sharon's "unilateral disengagement" plan. Labor advocates an Israeli pullout from Gaza and most of the West Bank for peace with the Palestinians.

The Palestinians want to establish an independent state in the two areas, which Israel captured in the 1967 Mideast war.

Students prioritize job, class schedules

Campus jobs offer flexibility

By Courtney Keith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Finding a balance between work and school can be a delicate process, but it certainly can be done.

Quentin Green, junior in philosophy, has a part-time job working at the Language Learning Center in Eisenhower Hall.

Green said students can be successful with both school and work through organization and prioritizing.

He said he feels lucky to have a campus job because of the flexibility that campus jobs typically offer.

"The hours are good, since they are between 9 a.m. and 5 p.m. I can go to work between classes and interact with peers and meet new people," he said. "I also save money on gas."

Although Career and Employment Services is a main source for information about campus jobs, many students are unaware of the resources available to them through the university, CES Director Kerri Day Keller, said.

"Historically our office has been related to full-time positions, but over the past few years our resources have expanded more toward internships and part-time jobs," Keller said.

During the last year, she said there have been more than 800 part-time jobs from more than 600 companies listed on the CES Web site. The part-time job listing page of their Web site has received more than 100,000 hits this year.

"Employers contact our office because they want to hire K-State students; they prefer to hire K-State students," Keller said.

"We also have the University Recognition program, which allows students to keep full-time status while they complete their internships," said Brantley.

Caleb Jackson, senior in business management, said organization is the key to working and going to college.

"I try to keep stuff separate. I set aside hours for school and hours for work," Jackson said. "I divide things evenly through the week and still try to have time for fun things, like being the president of the Japanese Appreciation Alliance. My social life is limited to weekends."

Jackson said he has worked at Game Stop at Manhattan Town Center for five years. He said he chose Game Stop because he is interested in the video and computer gaming industry and hopes to stay close to the industry even after he graduates.

"I like my job because it is a fun, friendly and relaxing environment," Jackson said. "It also beats working at a fast-food restaurant."

Even though Jackson does not work on campus, he said he benefits from having an understanding boss.

"My boss, who is also a student, says that school comes first and work can be rearranged for our needs," Jackson said.

Officials accuse doctors of abuse

By Emma Ross
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LONDON — Doctors working for the U.S. military in Iraq collaborated with interrogators in the abuse of detainees at Baghdad's Abu Ghraib prison, profoundly breaching medical ethics and human rights, a bioethicist charges in The Lancet medical journal.

In a scathing analysis of the behavior of military doctors, nurses and medics, University of Minnesota professor Steven Miles calls for a reform of military medicine and an official investigation into the role played by physicians and other medical staff in the torture scandal.

He cites evidence that doctors or medics falsified death certificates to cover up homicides, hid evidence of beatings and revived a prisoner so he could be further tortured.

No reports of abuses were initiated by medical personnel until the official investigation into Abu Ghraib began, he found.

"The medical system collaborated with designing and implementing psychologically and physically coercive interrogations," Miles said in this week's edition of Lancet. "Army officials stated that a physician and a psychiatrist helped design, approve and monitor interrogations at Abu Ghraib."

The analysis does not shed light on how many doctors were involved or how widespread the problem of medical complicity was, aspects that Miles said he is now investigating.

A U.S. military spokesman said the incidents recounted by Miles came primarily from the Pentagon's own investigation of the abuses.

"Many of these cases remain under investigation and charges will be brought against any individual where there is evidence of abuse," said Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, U.S. Army spokesman for detainee operations in Iraq.

In a related matter, two military officials in Washington said Thursday that a high-level Army inquiry will cite medical personnel who knew of abuse at Abu Ghraib but did not report it up the chain of command. The inquiry also will criticize senior U.S. commanders for a lack of leadership that allowed abuses to occur, but finds no evidence they ordered the abuse, said the sources, who spoke condition of anonymity.

Photographs of prisoners being abused and humiliated by U.S. troops in Iraq have sparked worldwide condemnation. Although the conduct of soldiers has been scrutinized, the role of medical staff in the scandal has received relatively little attention.

"The detaining power's health personnel are the first and often the last line of defense against human rights abuses. Their failure to assume that role emphasizes to the prisoner how utterly beyond humane appeal they are," Miles said in a telephone interview with The Associated Press.

Miles gathered evidence from U.S. congressional hearings, sworn statements of detainees and soldiers, medical journal accounts and press reports to build a picture of physician complicity, and in isolated cases active participation by medical personnel in abuse at the Baghdad prison, as well as in Afghanistan and at the Guantanamo Bay detention center in Cuba.

In one example, cited in a sworn statement from an Abu Ghraib detainee, a prisoner collapsed and was apparently unconscious after a beating. Medical staff revived the detainee and left, allowing the abuse to continue, Miles reported.

Depositions from two detainees at Abu Ghraib described an incident in which a doctor allowed a medically untrained guard to sew up a prisoner's wound.

A military police officer reported a medic inserted an intravenous tube into the corpse of a detainee who died while being tortured to create evidence that he was alive at the hospital, Miles said.

At prisons in both Iraq and Afghanistan, "Physicians routinely attributed detainee deaths on death certificates to heart attacks, heat stroke or natural causes without noting the unnatural (cause) of the death," Miles wrote.

He cites an example from a Human Rights Watch report in which soldiers tied a beaten detainee to the top of his cell door and gagged him. The death certificate indicated he died of "natural causes ... during his sleep." However, after media coverage, the Pentagon changed the cause of death to homicide by blunt force injuries and suffocation.

The World Medical Association, an umbrella group for national medical associations, reiterated its policy of condemning any doctor's involvement in abuse or torture of detainees.

In an editorial comment, The Lancet condemned the behavior of the doctors, saying that despite dual loyalties, they are doctors first and soldiers second.

"Health care workers should now break their silence," the journal said. "Those who were involved or witnessed ill-treatment need to give a full and accurate account of events at Abu Ghraib and Guantanamo Bay. Those who are still in positions where dual commitments prevent them from putting the rights of their patients above other interests should protest loudly and refuse cooperation with authorities."

Attorney: Nichols will not appeal life sentence

By Tim Talley
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PONCA CITY, Okla. — Oklahoma City bombing conspirator Terry Nichols will not appeal his state murder convictions for his role in the 1995 bombing of the Oklahoma City federal building, his attorney said Thursday.

In a brief statement, attorney Brian Hermanson said Nichols did not want to prolong the pain for victims' families.

"As he said in his sentencing, Terry sincerely hopes that the final conclusion of this case will be the beginning of a long-awaited healing process for all those impacted by the bombing," Hermanson wrote.

Nichols' attorneys had been advising him against appealing his 161 state murder convictions, because an appeal could mean a new trial and another opportunity for prosecutors to seek the death penalty.

Nichols, 49, is already serving life in prison without parole on federal charges for the April 19, 1995, bombing, which killed 168 people. Nichols was spared the death penalty for a second time when his state jury deadlocked on a sentence.

Nichols was sentenced to life in prison without parole in the late 1990s on federal involuntary manslaughter and conspiracy convictions for the deaths of eight federal law enforcement officers after jurors at that trial also deadlocked on whether to sentence Nichols to death. The state charges are for the other 160 victims and one victim's fetus.

Energy Department reports missing nuclear data

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — An inventory has found another case of missing data involving nuclear weapons, this time at the Energy Department's regional office in Albuquerque, N.M., the department disclosed Thursday.

The Energy Department said that an "accounting discrepancy" involving three copies of a "controlled removable electronic media" (CREM) was found at the regional office as part of the nationwide inventory of such devices.

The inventory was ordered a month ago after two CREM data devices were reported missing at the Los Alamos National Laboratory, also in New Mexico.

The Albuquerque facility, part of the DOE's National Nuclear Security Administration, coordinates activities with the Los Alamos weapons lab.

Bryan Wilkes, an NNSA spokesman, said that the inventory discovered three copies of a single CREM unaccounted for.

He declined to elaborate further except to say the device contained information involving nuclear weapons.

NNSA Administrator Linton Brooks said that all classified work involving the computer data storage devices has been halted at the Albuquerque office, pending completion of the investigation.

"I am disappointed that we have found another case of lax procedures in protecting classified information," Brooks said in a statement.

Energy Secretary Spencer Abraham on July 23 ordered that work involving CREM — disks or other removable computer storage devices — be halted at all the government's nuclear weapons facilities until inventories of the devices are conducted and new security procedures put in place.

The missing device at the Albuquerque office was discovered as part of that inventory, Wilkes said.

Meanwhile, investigators, despite extensive searches, have yet to find the two CREM devices that were reported missing at the Los Alamos laboratory in the New Mexico mountains 100 miles north of Albuquerque. The investigation into that incident was continuing.

No one was suggesting that the classified information — either at Los Alamos or in the DOE regional office — had been stolen or that the disappearances involved espionage. However, DOE officials have been concerned about lax procedures and security involving the handling of such devices.

"I expect NNSA employees, both federal and contractor, to adhere to the highest standards of performance" when using such data in removable computer devices, Brooks said.

Aside from this latest case, the nationwide CREM inventory review so far has produced no incidents or discrepancies, Wilkes said.

Many of the sites including the Savannah River nuclear facility in South Carolina, the Y-12 facility at Oak Ridge, Tenn., and the Pantex facility in Texas have resumed normal operations, according to the department.

Concerns over security and safety at the nuclear weapons lab came to a head in July, after two computer disks containing classified information were reported missing at the Los Alamos lab.

Almost all work at the lab was shut down and 23 employees were suspended as a result of the investigation into the security lapses.

Technology helps disbursement of insurance after hurricane

By Brendan Farrington
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PUNTA GORDA, Fla. — It took years for many insurance claims to be paid following Hurricane Andrew in 1992.

This time, technology is helping speed along the claims process for residents hit hardest by Hurricane Charley.

"I really think the industry can handle this without a lot of problems," Florida Chief Financial Officer Tom Gallagher said during a tour Thursday of Charlotte County. "The industry now knows what a major storm can be and they're prepared for it. So is the state."

Charley killed 22 people in Florida and state officials said more than 335,000 customers were without power Thursday. Charlotte County residents were not expected to have their electricity fully restored for another 10 days.

Charley has caused an estimated $7.4 billion in damage to homes, businesses and personal possessions, more than any other hurricane in Florida since Andrew.

Gallagher recalled in the aftermath of Andrew, it took "six to eight months before we got a handle on it."

Still, most owners of property damaged by Charley will have to pay more out of their pockets than Andrew's victims did.

Instead of set dollar deductibles, which were the standard before Andrew, policies now have deductibles based on a percentage of the insured property, which generally require the insured to pay a larger portion of the damage.

Nevertheless, technology is playing to homeowners' advantage, speeding up the pace in which insurance companies can begin addressing claims.

That translates into residents getting insurance checks much faster.

"The faster the process gets started, the sooner they'll get back on their feet," said Bill Mellander, who was flown in by Allstate from Illinois as part of their disaster-response team.

Club events fuel competitive spirit colleges, and small colleges.

The club is ranked third in the nation after traveling last year to Los Angeles for the National Club Championship Tournament.

"It is like anything else. The sidelines are comfortable, but they are the sidelines and never move. Get involved," Baker said.

In addition to the more traditional sports K-State has to offer, there are a few extreme sports that can fulfill the interest of a number of students.

For instance, if you want to get away from the plains of Kansas, the snow ski/snow board club takes a trip every May to Colorado to camp and ski.

David Burch, founder and skier, said it's different, because it is an individual sport unlike football, baseball and basketball.

"With skiing and boarding, you can really express yourself and ride how you want to. It's all up to you," he said. "When I came to K-State, I found there was no club for skiing, so I started this club, and it's been a blast," he said.

CHICAGO — United Airlines said it "likely" will have to terminate its employee pension funds to secure loans it needs to get out of bankruptcy — a step that would represent the largest pension default by a U.S. company.

The statement, made in bankruptcy court papers filed Wednesday and seen publicly Thursday, confirmed the fears of unions that had already gone to court in July to fight United's decision to halt pension contributions while in Chapter 11.

Cash-strapped United faces half a billion dollars in pension contributions in the next two months and $4.1 billion by the end of 2008.

In its court filing, the nation's second-largest carrier cited "stark" financial conditions and the need to improve its prospects of landing bankruptcy exit financing.

The government recently rejected United's bid for a $1.6 billion loan guarantee. The airline also faces higher jet fuel prices expected to cost it an extra $1 billion in 2004.

United's four employee pension plans currently are underfunded by about $8.3 billion. If the company scraps the funds, that would dump $6.4 billion of that funding responsibility onto the government-financed Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp.

Gary Pastorius, a spokesman for the pension protection program, said $6.4 billion is the maximum the agency would be allowed to cover under its congressional mandate. Employees would lose the difference.

United said in its court filing that it must maintain cash flow and liquidity levels "that the financial markets are willing to finance."

"Given the magnitude of further cost reductions needed to create a viable business plan and attract exit financing, termination and replacement of all our defined benefit pension plans likely will be required," the Elk Grove Village-based company said.

United employees have already been dealt steep wage and benefit cuts during the airline's restructuring, and other carriers are watching United's pension moves as they consider their options.

Pakistan readies for inauguration of new prime minister

By Munir Ahmad
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — Finance minister Shaukat Aziz is set to become Pakistan's prime minister next week, after he convincingly won the parliamentary seat he needed to take up the post, officials said Thursday.

Aziz, who narrowly escaped assassination when a suicide bomber attacked him on the campaign trail three weeks ago, won two by-elections by huge margins on Wednesday, amid opposition claims of vote rigging.

The former Citibank executive, has helped marshal a recovery in Pakistan's economy since it faced international sanctions in 1998 for testing nuclear weapons. The government of President Gen. Pervez Musharraf nominated Aziz for prime minister after Zafarullah Khan Jamali stepped down in June.

Aziz needed to win a parliamentary seat before he could take the premiership, so two ruling party loyalists resigned from their seats to facilitate the by-elections and clear the way for his candidacy.

"I am grateful to those who voted for me, and I will do whatever is possible to improve economy and law and order situation in the country," Aziz said told reporters.

The caretaker prime minister, Chaudhry Shujaat Hussain, said Wednesday that the transfer of power to Aziz would be completed in a "couple of days."

Bill Hall, founding member of Citizens For Higher Education, talks about a slide that shows the percentage of higher education students compared to their state's population. Hall, along with partner Bill Taylor, spoke about state funding for higher education Thursday afternoon in the Union Little Theatre.

higher education, Hall said, because the economy is changing to require more knowledge-based workers.

Bill Taylor, member of Citizens for Higher Education, said several factors contributed to the state's current situation, including a weak economy, fixed expenditures and variable revenues.

The combination of factors left Kansas with needs in several areas of funding, Taylor said, including tuition rates and state funding. The lack of funding makes it difficult to maintain top-notch facilities and premier faculty, he said.

Professors' salaries at K-State are more than $15,000 below the Big 12 average. The average K-State professor earns $74,500, compared to the Big 12 average of $89,589.

"I would like to see the state compensate for faculty salaries rather than using tuition increases," Urkevich said.

Hall said the changes have to start with the Legislature committing to the cause.

"I would think students would expect the Legislature to fulfill at least the Big 12 average," Hall said. "At the same time, the Legislature should expect the students to pay tuition that is in line with the Big 12 average."

To make up the difference, Kansas would have to devote $203 million more per year to higher education. Taylor said $150 million could come from the state — about a 20 percent increase — and $53 million more from other sources.

Hall said he was confident Kansans support higher education, but was unsure whether legislators would commit to fund it.

"Elected officials maybe don't understand how important higher education is to us," he said. "Kansans value education."

blared from the loudspeakers of Fallujah's mosques.

U.S. forces have routinely bombed targets in the city it says are strongholds of Sunni insurgents believed responsible for violence against coalition troops, Iraqi forces and civilians.

Militants elsewhere in Iraq attacked oil facilities in the north and south, fired mortars at U.S. Embassy offices in the capital, injuring one American, and threatened to kill two hostages, a Turkish worker and a U.S. journalist.

In a speech, interim Prime Minister Ayad Allawi had warned the radical cleric to disarm his forces and withdraw from the shrine after his government threatened to send a massive Iraqi force to root them out.

Defying that ultimatum, al-Sadr sent a telephone text message vowing to seek "martyrdom or victory," and his jubilant followers inside the shrine danced and chanted.

Later in the day, a top al-

Sadr aide said the cleric had ordered his militia to leave the shrine where they have been holed up for two weeks fighting Iraqi and U.S. forces. But in a letter shown by the Arab television station Al-Jazeera, al-Sadr said he would not disband his Al Mahdi Army.

The violence in the holy city between the insurgents and a combined U.S.-Iraqi force has angered many in Iraq's Shiite majority and proven a major challenge to Allawi's fledgling interim government as it tries to build credibility and prove it is not a U.S. puppet.

Any raid to oust militants from the Imam Ali shrine — especially one that damaged the holy site — could spark a far larger Shiite uprising. Government accusations that militants have mined the shrine compound and reports that women and children were among those inside could further complicate a raid.

Some of those in the compound were "dancing and cheering," a CNN journalist reported from inside the shrine, where she was among jour-ists escorted there with help from the Iraqi government, the U.S. military and al-Sadr's Mahdi Army.

"They are all very proud to be in here and seem to be very adamant about staying in here," CNN reporter Kianne Sadeq said.

"They aren't going anywhere until the fighting is over."

In the impoverished Baghdad neighborhood of Sadr City — named for the cleric's late father — U.S. tanks moved throughout the streets and helicopter gunships shot at al-Sadr militants from the skies. The militants claimed five fighters and five civilians were killed.

There was no certainty that the latest offer from al-Sadr to withdraw would be implemented, as both sides appeared to be engaged in brinkmanship.

Thursday's violence came a day after al-Sadr had accepted an Iraqi delegation's peace plan for Najaf, demanding he disarm his militia, leave the shrine and turn to politics in exchange for amnesty.

CHALLENGE | Friendships form in religious groups

"It's been declining," he said. "Some have difficulties obtaining visas. Some had family that did not want them to come to the U.S."

Still, whether membership is increasing or declining, there are many reasons students choose to attend religious gatherings.

"I wasn't necessarily looking for a group," said Joanna Testa, sophomore in clinical lab science and member of Campus Crusade, another Christian group. "They told me about it, and I really liked it."

Testa said she has ended up living with the friends she met at Crusade.

"We started coming together and built on the friendship," she said.

Although Testa has not visited any other group, she said she has really enjoyed Crusade.

"It's a great experience. You can meet a lot of people and feel spiritual at the same time," she said.

Mandy Kowalewski, part-time staff for Christian Challenge and senior in family financial planning, said she visited all the other Christian groups before settling on Christian Challenge, and she also started attending with friends.

"I clicked with some of the people," she said. "There was a lot of activities for freshman to get involved."

Being a part of Christian Challenge has been very important to her spirituality, she said.

"My walk with God is very important to me, and this helped facilitate it," she said. "College is a time that people come searching. Groups like Christian Challenge teach students important things everyone needs to know."

GOP unveils proposal for national intelligence director

By Michael J. Sniffen
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Senate Intelligence Committee Republicans proposed removing the nation's largest intelligence gathering operations from the CIA and the Pentagon and putting them directly under a new national intelligence director.

Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., the committee chairman, unveiled on Sunday the most sweeping intelligence reorganization proposal offered by anyone since the Sept. 11 commission called for major changes. In an appearance on CBS' "Face the Nation," Roberts acknowledged that full details had yet to be shared with either the White House or with Senate Democrats.

"We didn't pay attention to turf or agencies or boxes" but rather to "what are the national security threats that face this country today," Roberts said of the proposals supported by eight GOP members of the intelligence committee. "I'm trying to build a consensus around something that's very different and very bold."

But he immediately ran into some resistance from a Democrat on his own committee. Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., said that before appearing with Roberts on the CBS show neither he nor the committee's ranking Democrat, Jay Rockefeller of West Virginia, had seen the full proposal.

"I think it would be better to start on a bipartisan basis," Levin said. "I think it's a mistake to begin with a partisan bill, no matter what is in it."

The commission that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks called for a powerful national intelligence director who could force the nation's many agencies to cooperate.

The debate has focused on how much power to give that official rather than on retooling agencies. Most Democrats have supported the commission's proposal that the new director have authority over hiring and spending by the intelligence agencies. President Bush has endorsed creating the position but has not reached a final decision on what powers the office should have.

Roberts said his aides had spoken with White House officials and would share the details of his proposal with them on Monday.

Roberts' plan would put the CIA's three main directorates — operations, which runs intelligence collection and covert actions; intelligence, which analyzes intelligence reports; and science and technology — into three new, separate and renamed agencies, each reporting to a separate assistant national intelligence director. It also would remove three of the largest intelligence agencies from the Pentagon.

Although the measure would essentially dismantle the CIA, Roberts said in a paper he released: "We are not abolishing the CIA. We are reordering and renaming its three major elements."

"No one agency, no matter how distinguished its history, is more important than U.S. national security," the paper

Members of Bethel AME find inspiration through faith, one another as church grows

By Lacey Storer

In a small, simply decorated room, a small group of people meets to worship. The reverend gives a passionate service, leading the congregation in hymns and prayers.

Though only about 30 people have gathered for church, the congregation at Bethel AME make up for what they lack in size with their spirit.

Sitting on the corner of Fourth and Yuma, Bethel AME (African Methodist Episcopal) is a church somewhat different from others.

Still in the original building built for it in 1880, Bethel AME is a church with a long history.

The oldest church in Manhattan, Bethel was used as a safe house for runaway slaves in the 1800s. Passengers on the underground railroad followed the church's now-gone steeple to safety.

AME churches are "connectional churches," meaning all branches of the church throughout the United States and other countries are connected. When a member of the church moves to

Professors lead research on stem cells

By Melissa Baier
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Stem cell research has been a hot topic in politics in recent years. However, there is stem cell research that isn't prohibited by law and is being conducted here at K-State.

Deryl Troyer and Mark Weiss, both professors of anatomy and physiology, along with Duane Davis, professor of animal science and industry, are members of teams leading the way in umbilical cord stem cell research.

Embryonic stem cell research has become controversial because many groups believe a fertilized embryo constitutes a human being.

"Unfortunately people hear the term stem cells, and they automatically conclude that it is coming from an embryonic source — an unfortunate connotation that is not always accurate," Weiss said.

The type of research that these professors are conducting is based on the extraction of stem cells from the umbilical cord after a mother has given birth to her child. At that point the umbilical cord is

WORLD IN REVIEW: 7 THINGS YOU DIDN'T KNOW 7 DAYS AGO

Kerry, Bush continue war of words

Hector Mata | GETTY IMAGES

Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry raises his hands Friday as he prepares to address members of the community at Central Piedmont Community College in Charlotte. Kerry on Thursday accused his Republican rival President George W. Bush of using a front group to discredit his Vietnam war record.

Staff and wire reports

Presidential candidate John Kerry blasted incumbent George W. Bush on Thursday, accusing Bush of relying on third-party groups to investigate his service record in the Vietnam War.

Kerry, at a speech in Boston, accused Bush of "(wanting) them to do his dirty work."

The Bush campaign, meanwhile, has criticized Kerry in television ads sponsored by Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, an organization funded by supporters of Bush.

VIOLENCE IN NAJAF

On Tuesday, U.S. forces bombed a cemetery near Najaf as delegates to a national conference in Baghdad extended the conference in an effort to open more discussion on a peace effort. Violence in Baghdad continued as explosions in the city's streets killed 7 and wounded 35.

HIKING DEATH

A 19-year-old resort worker died in Anchorage, Alaska, last week after slipping on loose terrain.

Bethany Pate, a native of Cleveland, Tenn., fell 45 feet onto rocks below. She was hiking on 4,500-foot Mt. Healy, and her climbing partners said she lost her footing on the trail.

MISSING GIRL FOUND DEAD

Police on Thursday found the body of 7-year-old Patricia Miles, who had been missing since Aug. 15.

Miles' body was found in a north-eastern Arkansas field. Police had arrested a family friend, JoAnn Buchanan, on charges of kidnapping, although the family insists she is innocent.

BOYCOTT IN VENEZUELA

Opponents of populist leader Hugo Chavez announced Friday in Venezuela they would boycott regional elections following Chavez' victory to another term as president.

The opponents said Friday they believed the election was rigged in favor of Chavez and that there was no point in even having the Sept. 26 elections to elect state governors and mayors.

Chavez was first elected in 1998; his term now ends in 2006.

NEW BTK EVIDENCE

Investigators in Wichita's BTK serial killings said Friday they have evidence in his writings that links the killer to P.J. Wyatt, a former professor at Wichita State University who died in 1991.

The killer sent a letter to police and the media in May that had a section that included lyrics similar to those in a folk song, "Oh! Death," as well as a section titled "PJs," which police believe is a reference to Wyatt.

She had taught the song in a class at the university.

UNWARRANTED SEARCH

Neverland Ranch property manager Joseph Marcus said in court Friday that searches of Michael Jackson's property were done so without a proper warrant.

At a pretrial hearing, Marcus said he had agreed in November to allow police to search Jackson's personal office, but only to establish that the area was secure. Marcus said the officers actually searched the office, which went beyond the restrictions of the warrant. The search went on for 15 hours, and 40 officers were involved.

Jackson's trial is set for Jan. 31.

College's purchase of trailer lends ease to competition

Drew Rose | COLLEGIAN

Amber Crawshaw, May 2004 graduate in interior architecture, listens as Daniel Creekmore, senior in interior architecture, explains how to put together his entry piece. Creekmore's furniture piece qualified for the national competition in Atlanta.

By Joanna Rubick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Before this year, U-Haul provided services for the College of Architecture, Planning and Design, but this year the college decided to purchase a trailer, which ultimately will save costs.

The $3,000 trailer began its first trip Sunday to Atlanta, Ga. for the Student Furniture Design Competition, Bob Bullock, professor of interior architecture, said.

"Every year our department has needs of a trailer," he said. "I guess we're tired of renting trailers."

Six students were finalists in the competition, so they are taking their works to Atlanta to be judged along with about 80 other projects, Bullock said.

Although K-State has the second number of finalists, six is a rather low number from years past, he said.

"There have been years when we've had 20 or 22 finalists, but there has been more interest in the show in the last few years," Bullock said.

"There's so many schools that I think they make an effort to accept as many different schools as possible."

Amber Crawshaw, May 2004 graduate in interior architecture whose chosen entry is a stool made of bent plywood, said she wasn't surprised K-State students' works were chosen.

"I think a lot of us expected for some to make it to the finals, but which students we had no idea," Crawshaw said. "It's always exciting to see students' work get chosen."

Brian Pelcak, graduate in interior architecture, said he is glad they have their own trailer to take to the competition because it is more professional.

"We used to take a U-Haul trailer or a really big university van — nothing as formal," he said.

Although Pelcak did not make it to the finals, he is attending the competition to help out.

"Students put an awful lot of blood and sweat in their projects," he said. "It's good to be recognized for our efforts."

System helps in chemical cleanup

By Jessica Ballard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Safety scares, such as the King Hall fire last year, are one reason for the development of FastAct, a new chemical hazard containment and neutralization system.

Al Smetana, graduate teaching assistant in chemistry, said FastAct is easy to use. After the product has been used on a spill, the remains can be swept away, he said.

FastAct is produced by NanoScale, a research facility in K-State's research park.

This chemical containment is relatively new to the market, so K-State is one of the first to use it as a safeguard, said Kenneth Klabunde, professor and founder of NanoScale.

Smetana said FastAct originally was created for destruction of chemical warfare agents, but it now is being used to neutralize toxic chemicals.

Smetana said FastAct is "basically an absorbent powder used to neutralize chemical spills."

The product is also available in pressurized cylinders.

"It works much like a fire extinguisher, so if you can point and shoot, anyone can use it,"

Smetana said.

Kyle Knappenberger, Manager of technical sales support for Nanoscale, said FastAct is currently available in some labs across campus including King, Vet Med, and Call Hall.

According to a press release, K-State President Jon Wefald feels the safety of students, faculty, and the community is extremely important, which is why the new technology is being added.

Although safety is important, Klabunde said he feels K-State is a great place to test out FastAct because it was developed here.

Forces battle over Najaf shrine

By Abdul Hussein Al-Obeidi
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NAJAF, Iraq — Explosions and gunfire shook Najaf's Old City on Sunday in a fierce battle between U.S. forces and Shiite militants, as negotiations dragged on for the handover of the shrine that the fighters have used for their stronghold.

Also Sunday, five U.S. troops were reported dead in separate incidents, and an American journalist held hostage and threatened with death if U.S. forces did not leave Najaf was released by his captors.

The violence in Najaf on Sunday was more intense than in recent days. U.S. forces sealed off Najaf's Old City and bombed the militants with warplanes. But Iraqi government officials counseled patience, saying they intended to resolve the crisis without raiding the Imam Ali Shrine, one of Shia Islam's holiest sites.

"The government will leave no stone unturned to reach a peaceful settlement," Iraqi National Security adviser Mouaffaq al-Rubaie told The Associated Press.

"It has no intention or interest in killing more people or having even the most trivial damage to the shrine. We have a vested interest in a peaceful settlement," al-Rubaie said.

Senior government officials said last week an Iraqi force was preparing to raid the shrine within hours to expel the militants loyal to radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, but interim Prime Minister Ayad Allawi quickly backed off that threat.

Such an operation would anger Shiites across the country and could turn them against the new government as it tries to gain legitimacy and tackle a 16-month-old insurgency.

In the Anbar province, the heart of the Sunni insurgency, four U.S. Marines with the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force were killed in separate incidents, the military announced Sunday.

A roadside bomb attack Sunday targeting a U.S. military convoy outside the northern city of Mosul killed one U.S. soldier assigned to Task Force Olympia and wounded another, the military said.

The injured soldier was in stable condition. Two Iraqi children also were injured in the blast, said Dr. Mohammed Ahmed of al-Jumhuri hospital.

As of Friday, 949 U.S. service members have died since the beginning of military operations in Iraq in March 2003, according to the U.S. Defense Department.

Late Sunday, U.S. journalist Micah Garen, who was kidnapped Aug. 13 in the southern city of Nasiriyah, was released along with his Iraqi translator at al-Sadr's offices there after the cleric's aides appealed for his freedom.

TO THE POINT Intelligence proposal needs broader approval from Congress

A proposal to overhaul the nation's intelligence gathering operations, led by Sen. Pat Roberts, lacks the broad approval and in-depth effort to effect the positive changes needed to protect the nation.

While the proposal shows that the findings of the Sept. 11 commission have not been ignored completely by members of Congress, the manner in which Roberts' proposal was crafted neglects numerous areas of concern.

The proposal by Roberts' group was developed solely by Republicans on the Senate Intelligence Committee, of which Roberts is chairman.

Furthermore, the full details of Roberts' proposal had not been shared with White House officials or congressional Democrats by the time of its unveiling. Not only should these details have been circulated to the White House and the full Congress, but Democrats and Bush administration officials should have been involved in the creation of the proposal.

Representatives and senators, regardless of party or ideology, should come together in a timely fashion for a thorough evaluation of the Sept. 11 commission's recommendations.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Legitimate employment

U.S. government denies illegal workers important rights to jobs

Just when you think Immigration and Customs Enforcement isn't doing its job they come in and haul off a few illegal workers. Never mind that some of them have lived and worked here for months, even years. It's better late than never.

After all, illegal workers display a horrendous amount of audacity when they risk life and limb to sneak into the United States, travel all the way to Kansas and then get a respectable job.

Fortunately, we won't be troubled by them anymore.

For too long we have sat by listening to some dried up old lady blather endlessly on about the tired and the poor, huddled masses in the land of opportunity.

Well I'm here to say no more. It's time we take back America.

How can we look at ourselves in the eye? How can we explain ourselves to those Americans who are just too lazy or inept to work that some non-American came here and not only got a job, but managed a business?

The prospect is just too shameful to even think about. Average Americans denied the chance to refuse to work, just because some illegal immigrants wanted a chance to pull themselves up by their own bootstraps!

I scarcely can imagine the gall of these people who show up in this country wanting nothing more than the chance to work.

The opportunities here are specially reserved for 100 percent full-blooded Americans. And if we don't want them, we certainly don't want anyone else to have them either.

This huge influx of immigrants from all over the world is an affront to the welfare state. Or is it welfare of the state?

Anyway, these people come in huge numbers not only wanting, but willing to work for the American dream.

American dream my eye.

Just where do these people get off swarming here in such numbers? It's like they think this great nation was founded by immigrants.

Anyone who has ever read history knows that in 1492 Christopher Columbus sailed into an already bustling New York City.

The skyline was a little different back then because the Americans hadn't built the Statue of Liberty yet, but other than that it was pretty much the same.

He explored New York for a few days but returned to his ship after getting mugged.

After leaving New York he sailed downward to Trenton N.J., where one of his ships got stolen. They spent a few days looking and finally found it with all the sails stolen and the radio gone.

They continued southward until they finally reached Miami where Columbus acquired some American spice, known by the local natives as "blow," and finally, under threat from Immigration and Naturalization Services, sailed back to Italy where he came from.

So how can there be any doubt in anyone's mind that America is, was and always will be only for 100-percent Americans? All this nonsense has to be put straight right now.

If these non-Americans want some sort of "melting pot," then my advice to them is to try next door.

That's not to say we can't let anyone in.

There are some out there with the proper identification, right forms, correct signatures, signed authorization of 198 people, and their next 10 years of tax paid up front that I honestly believe can become productive Americans.

There also are several who could be admitted upon merit alone. For example, I think Anna Kournikova, Heidi Klum, Charlize Theron, Salma Hayek and on certain days Fabio could all be declared free of their non-American status.

And once they are declared 100-percent American, then the sky is the limit.

One need only look at Arnold Schwarzenegger, who after becoming 100-percent American, proceeded to enjoy the fine Austrian pastime of rifling with other countries' politics.

Let us sing

praise for Arnold

New job proves more stressful than studies

In the past three days, I've been walking around campus and seeing a lot of people who don't look too pleased to be back in school.

While homework, lectures, and tests are a bit of a bummer, I'm here to tell all you "grumpy gusses" that it could be a lot worse and you should be glad classes have started up again.

Unless you're my rich friend Brian, you've probably had to get a summer job at some point, and you probably know that they're about as much fun as a skin graft.

I was well aware of that fact before heading into it, but I needed a vehicle, and therefore, a semi-reliable source of income for the summer.

So I strapped on my boots, packed my imaginary lunch pail and volunteered my services to the work force.

What follows goes down in history as the most miserable period of my life and should explain why I'm happy to be back in class.

I tried to start my new job optimistically. I figured, "Hey, what could be so bad about painting the barracks in Fort Riley for 12 hours a day?"

Pretty much everything, as it turns out. As if moving a paint roller up and down 175,000 times a day wasn't bad enough, try doing it with a guy who introduces himself as "Rooster" and constantly has leftover chew caked in his one front tooth.

Or try doing it with Rooster's friend, whose communication skills were so stellar that he opted against the traditional first-time introduction in favor of a blank stare and a "so ... do you rodeo?"

The days were long and the work was grueling. Gruelingly boring. Have you ever sanded a wall or scrubbed baseboards? Now imagine doing that for 12 hours.

Which is why I often passed the time at work by taking naps in the closet.

And for the record, I submit that there is no better feeling than being paid to sleep — just ask George Costanza.

Often times in my life — mostly at bad summer jobs — when raindrops keep fallin' on my head, I'll recant my own little mantra: "It could be worse, Jeremy. At least you don't have Ebola."

It usually works wonders and turns my frumpy frown upside-down.

But one day this summer while I was scraping paint, I started thinking "if only ..." and yearning for the sweet release a hemorrhagic fever and severe internal bleeding would provide.

When the steam whistle finally blew at the end of every work day, I'd go home a battered and broken man.

At nights I immediately would plop down on the sofa.

I then would proceed to cram about eleven Zebra Cakes in my pie-hole and sit there for a few hours, wallowing in a sea of self-pity and waiting for the semester to start.

So if you're bummed that school has started up again, don't be. I'm sure my summer sob story rings true for quite a few of you out there who had jobs like mine.

And if you're still mad, keep in mind that it could be worse. At least you don't have Ebola.

TUESDAY'S OPINIONS

Altaf Karim and Chaz Steimel clash on the issue of biased news media.

CAMPUS FOURUM | 395-4444

I just wanted to say, stealing underwear is a crime and crime doesn't pay.

A recent Fourum caller implied that it's OK for a U.S. soldier to beat the crap out of someone if they feel insulted. No wonder countless prisoners have been abused at Abu Ghraib, Guantanamo and elsewhere.

Matt Greneman? More like Roy Jeremy.

Here's a thought: how about instead of spending $750,000 on a bridge, we farm it out to the engineering students and give the rest of us a tuition break?

Hey, to you morons who stole my Brownback sign and stashed it at the Union, I got it back, and I'm putting it back up.

No Fourum on Friday? That freakin' sucks.

I was just running at the Rec and a big bat about flew into me. I wonder if they'd let me back in with a BB gun.

When are guys going to learn that it's not cool to peel out?

I'd like to thank the driver who splashed me today. Let me know in advance next time so I can wear a white

Yeah, I just wanted to say that the opinion editor sucks.

Article requires clarification about dangers of meningitis

Editor,

I would like to thank the Collegian for helping inform students about the risk of Neisseria meningitis diseases and the available vaccine.

The feature article was informative and accurate, but the editorial contained information that was misleading and could cause unwarranted alarm and confusion. This bacteria is spread by inhalation of infected droplets produced (coughing, sneezing) by healthy persons who are temporarily carrying the bacteria and who do not become ill.

The bacteria also can be spread by shared saliva (kissing, sharing drinks, etc.). However "shared bathrooms and drinking fountains" do not spread this bacterium, contrary to the editorial. An increased incidence of these diseases is related to people living in close contact situations.

There is an increased incidence of these diseases in freshmen that live in residence halls, as well as in students who frequent bars and/or smoke. Fraternities and sorority members also live in close contact environments and may have an increased risk, but this has not been studied, so no firm statement can be made.

Also, contrary to the editorialist's suggestion, while the vaccine is approximately 70 percent effective in protecting you from these diseases, it is unlikely to give protection to those around you.

Also, the incidence of these diseases seems to rise in the latter years of high school.

For those of you with younger family members, getting the vaccine in the later high school years might be the best time to get the vaccine so that protection would be available for the late high school and early college years. The risk decreases in the later college years.

Also, influenza may precede a meningitis infection, and therefore getting an influenza vaccination may help decrease the meningitis risk. For vaccine information call Lafene at 532-6544.

Christian groups on campus must welcome all students

Editor,

In the August 20th front-page article on campus religious groups, Joanna Rubick informs us that "other religions besides Christianity also are prevalent at K-State."

Really? You wouldn't be able to tell from a comparison of the number of times I've been invited to join Christian organizations since arriving on campus (more than 40) to the number of times I've encountered members of other religions (exactly zero).

I've been solicited by these organizations at tables I have to pass on my way to dinner, at booths along the sidewalk (the other day, there were three Christian booths set up between my dorm and the Union), in casual conversations with random people I've only met five minutes ago, and even by a door-to-door survey in my dorm.

When I explicitly state I'm not Christian, it doesn't dissuade them.

"Oh, we welcome people of any faith." Well, I'm sure they do, but subjecting myself to their repeated attempts to "bring me to Jesus" isn't my idea of a fun time.

Campus religious groups provide an important support system for many students, but their overwhelmingly Christian focus leaves non-Christians out in the cold — especially those like me who practice non-Abrahamic religions.

I see the comfort and fellowship others get from their Christian clubs and feel isolated, rejected and hurt. I am reminded constantly of my minority status and feel that I have to hide my faith or face ridicule.

Is that the kind of loving, welcoming atmosphere our religious groups aim to provide?

PERSPECTIVES

Longtime violence in Iraq small part of larger problem

MINNESOTA DAILY (U. MINNESOTA)

MINNEAPOLIS — The standoff between U.S. troops and forces loyal to the rebel Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr in Najaf, Iraq, is now well into its second week. Fighting has raged in close proximity to a 5-square-mile cemetery and within earshot of the holiest shrine in Shia Islam, the Imam Ali mosque. Whatever else the battle might say about the U.S. presence in Iraq, it has brought into sharp focus a war that is becoming the biggest foreign policy blunder in a generation.

Simply put, Iraq is a Vietnam-style quagmire in slow motion. The body count might not be in the tens of thousands, and the terrain might bear little resemblance to the jungles of Southeast Asia, but the war in Iraq is taking shape much like another colossal U.S. mistake did some 30 years ago.

Then, U.S. military might was steadily overwhelmed by a guerilla army intent on waging a decades-long war of attrition. Today, that same military finds itself stymied by a ragtag band of insurgents that understand roadside bombs can be every bit as deadly as laser-guided missiles.

U.S. troops in Iraq cannot afford to ignore al-Sadr's militias, and they have little choice but to go door-to-door in search of weapons and insurgents. But rummaging through Iraqi homes and handcuffing Iraqi men face-down in the dirt, like fighting in the shadows of Shiite mausoleums and mosques, will not win the hearts and minds of the Iraqi people.

Every insurgent attack leaves U.S. troops more wary of Iraqi civilians. And every angry confrontation between U.S. troops and Iraqi civilians fuels an insurgency with moral support and fresh recruits. Underneath this vicious cycle lies a quagmire with no end in sight.

As in Vietnam, U.S. hubris and incompetence are on vivid display. Once again, U.S. service people are bogged down in a seemingly unending conflict far from home. And, once more, the reasons for that conflict no longer make sense.

In the months leading up to the war in Iraq, U.S. officials consistently refused to speculate about how long troops would stay in Iraq. Now, 16 months and nearly 1,000 U.S. casualties after the fall of Saddam Hussein, those troops have no prospect of coming home any time soon. Sadly, the true cost of the war in Iraq has only just begun.

Tennis player finds niche in senior year at K-State

By Michael Ashford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's not every day a women's tennis player is compared to an All-America football player.

At first glance, Darren Sproles — K-State's star running-back — and Maria Rosenberg — K-State's All-Big 12 tennis star — are as different as night and day.

However, ask tennis head coach Steve Bietau to compare the two, and he spots the similarities between the athletes.

"Maria is of the Darren Sproles-model," Bietau said. "She is very humble, genuinely friendly to be around, very considerate of her teammates, but at the same time she is one of the toughest, most determined young women that I've ever coached."

The native of Moscow, Russia, is quick to speak of her teammates when asked about the successes she has had during her time as a Wildcat.

"I like the girls and we get along really well," Rosenberg said. "They teach me new things everyday."

In 2001, Rosenberg came to K-State a wide-eyed freshman looking to help out the team in any way, she said.

"My first year was basically finding out new things and Tennis player Maria Rosenberg has emerged as a leader for the women's tennis team. Going into her senior season, Rosenberg finished a junior year that included All-Big 12 status in both singles and doubles.

getting experience," Rosenberg said. "I just wanted to win as many matches as I could to contribute."

Contribute she did. Rosenberg posted a team best 19-9 overall record that first year while playing at the No. 4 spot and was the Big 12 singles runner-up at her position.

Her success carried over into her sophomore and junior seasons, when she finished 17-13 and 20-16 respectively, earning All-Big 12 status in singles and doubles her junior year.

Entering her senior season, Rosenberg said she is in better shape physically as a result of summer workouts designed to improve her game.

Along with Rosenberg's demands for herself are Bietau's expectations of his star player.

"She is going to play a huge role," Bietau said. "Not just in the sense that she is a player that can be at the top of a lineup, but in the sense that she is a player who can go from 4 to 2 to 1 and improve herself so much during her career just by her effort and her determination."

Rosenberg said she is ready for the added challenge of being a team leader.

"I can set an example, work hard, have a good attitude, and push everyone," she said. "I have to do those things first though, otherwise I'd be a follower."

Her teammates said they are confident in Rosenberg's ability to lead.

"I think she can help us. She is a very strong person and a great leader," freshman Olga Klimova said.

Bietau said he knows he has a special athlete and person in Rosenberg.

"Players like Maria don't come along very often," he said.

Olympics | Wildcat assistant wins silver in heptathlon

Current Wildcat assistant coach Austra Skujyte captured a silver medal in the heptathlon on Saturday.

Representing her native country of Lithuania, Skujyte earned her highest finish in international competition.

It was the former Wildcat's first Olympic medal as she beat out Great Britain's Kelly Sotherton by 11 points for the silver.

Skujyte is the K-State record holder in the heptathlon with 6,155 points.

Former Wildcat assistant coach Sheila Burrell also had a strong performance in the heptathlon, finishing in fourth place, good for the top U.S. finish.

Gatlin takes gold in 100

ATHENS, Greece — Justin Gatlin ran the race of his life Sunday night, barely holding off the field of Olympic 100-meter runners in history to win the gold in 9.85 seconds.

Francis Obikwelu of Portugal got the silver in 9.86. Defending champion Maurice Greene won bronze in 9.87, falling short in his quest to be crowned the greatest sprinter of all time.

A third American, Shawn Crawford, was fourth in 9.89. Five runners broke the 10-second mark, and another — world champion Kim Collins — finished in exactly 10 seconds.

It was the closest finish in an Olympic 100-meter final since the 1980 Moscow Games, when Allan Wells of Britain held off Silvio Leonard of Cuba as the two were timed in 10.25.

Gatlin's previous personal best was 9.92.

Softball wins 78th straight

ATHENS, Greece — One more victory and the U.S. softball team will have its goal: a third Olympic gold.

Right now, the Americans aren't just a Dream Team — they're more like the Perfect Team.

Lisa Fernandez pitched a three-hitter Sunday and Crystl Bustos drove in two runs as the Americans rolled to their eighth shutout in eight days, 5-0 over Australia, putting them into the gold medal game.

The Aussies set up a rematch for the gold when they beat Japan 3-0 later Sunday behind Tanya Harding, who has beaten the Americans twice during her Olympic career and is likely to face them again for the championship.

Natasha Watley had three more infield hits, Kelly Kretschman homered, and the U.S. team (8-0) dominated again. The Americans have won 78 straight games since last July and have yet to yield a run in the Athens Games. They've outscored their opponents 46-0 while allowing just 14 hits.

NCAA's bad decision harms two-sport star's status at Colorado

It's hard to feel sorry for University of Colorado football these days.

Between the stripers, alcohol and grand jury indictments, Coach Gary Barnett and his program have dug their own hole.

However, a NCAA ruling last week regarding the eligibility of wide receiver Jeremy Bloom makes me think the Buffaloes might have gotten the raw deal this time.

Last Tuesday, the NCAA rejected Bloom's request to play football at Colorado while accepting endorsements.

At first glance the decision seems logical.

The rules are simple — college athletes cannot be paid to play.

But there's more to the situation. Bloom isn't capitalizing on his ability as a big-play wideout and dangerous kick returner by taking money from a big name company so he can put spinners on his Escalade.

Bloom's endorsements are a necessity for his career as a world champion freestyle skier, because professional skiers do not exactly bring in the big bucks.

They don't even make a salary. In January, Bloom made it public that he would begin accepting endorsement money to fund his training for the 2006 Winter Olympics.

He tried to pay for his training out of his own wallet, but the expenses were too much, according to Bloom.

Sounds like a unique situation — a situation in which the NCAA could use a little understanding and common sense and grant Bloom a waiver.

After all, Bloom already has a history of giving away extra sponsorship money to charity — not a bad guy.

But the NCAA — like that professor who refuses to smile and won't bump that 89.9 to an A — will not budge.

Something's just not right here. While athletes with criminal records and poor classroom performances are given second, third and fourth chances to compete on the playing field (class, meet Miami's Willie Williams), a guy who just wants the financial resources to ski for his country is being turned away.

This doesn't make sense. It's just as illogical as it would be for the criminal justice system to sentence everybody who commits the same crime to the same amount of jail time.

Different circumstances call for different actions, and Bloom's case should have been a prime example of making an exception to the rule.

Contrary to what the NCAA might say, the flood gates would not have opened if it had ruled in favor of Bloom.

If the NCAA would have specifically said its ruling would not be the norm and was made due to special circumstances, they could have ward off the potential tide of players wanting a piece of the endorsement pie.

That didn't happen. Bloom is still fighting.

After contemplating giving up his lengthy fight with the powers-that-be, Bloom decided to appeal.

Wednesday, Colorado filed an appeal on Bloom's behalf, and this week a five-administrator panel from universities across the country will decide Bloom's fate.

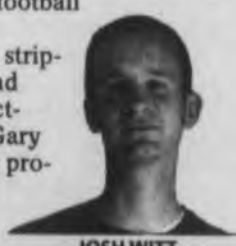

Bloom's case isn't the only major athlete-eligibility issue on the NCAA's plate.

One has to wonder if the NCAA is going to take the same uncompromising stance towards USC wide receiver Mike Williams and his ability to play this season.

Hopefully not. Maybe the NCAA will see the light and let Bloom play, but it's doubtful.

That would take common sense, understanding and the ability to suck up pride and do the right thing.

Unfortunately, I don't see that happening.

Band kills teenage apathy

JESSICA GRANT

Sometimes I despise my generation's attitude. This is probably because I am a Rage Against the Machine fan.

I also will admit that this feeling probably has a lot to do with the fact that I am like a crotchety old lady.

When I was 16, I got my first album by Rage. I had heard their song "Killing in the Name" three years before, but it wasn't until I was 16 that I found it really cool to blast the chorus "F*ck you / I won't do what you tell me."

The important thing to remember about 16-year-old people is that they are incredibly impressionable. No matter how hard a teenager tries to be ironic, most teenagers are simply not cynical enough to truly be affected and jaded by irony. Teenagers are usually angry, but not cynical. Rage was the first band I had ever heard that was overtly political. Sure, I had heard some punk music, but the Clash seemed to be archaic and dated to me — simply not music that could be applied to what was going on in the now. Rage made it cool to care.

In his book "Fargo Rock City," cultural critic Chuck Klosterman says "pop music doesn't matter for what it is; it matters for what it does. The greatest thing about rock 'n' roll music is that it's an art form where the audience is more important than the art itself." This is why Rage is important.

It didn't matter that Rage front man Zach de la Rocha looked and sang like a homeless simian. It didn't matter that some of their songs were outside-the-mainstream about political interests. What mattered was the audience.

I believe that Rage was a successful band because they made me care about the world. Rage was the band that sparked my interest in Indian activist Leonard Peltier and the Zapatista Liberation Movement. Rage did not make the best music, but they had a message that changed they way I looked at the world.

Rage made me care about the state of things and made me want to make a difference. If I heard the band for the first time at age 21, I would have dismissed the band, already being cynical enough to have missed that window of adolescence that makes it possible for a band to be able to redirect teenage anger.

This is why I sometimes despise my generation. I believe that one of the biggest problems faced by my generation is apathy. I could get really boring here and rant about numbers, but most of us already know that 18-24 year olds represent a huge portion of the population that never votes.

I get sick of the rock star wannabe types who simply lament that there is "no one to vote for," because there will be choices on the ballot in November. The only way to really make a difference is to try. The only way to change the world is to care. Being apathetic isn't as cool as some think.

The first step to beating the problem of apathy is to vote.

 PROFESSOR OF PSYCHOLOGY

Unlikely artists

Gallery features artwork by K-State professors

By Tony Herrman
 KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The featured painter in the current exhibition at the Strecker-Nelson gallery is a professor, but not of art.

James Jones, head of the architecture department, has been painting all his life and has an undergraduate degree in art.

Jones said he did not think the public's view of his art was influenced by the fact that he is an architecture professor and not an artist.

"Some people know me more as an artist than an architect," he said.

For Jones, architecture and painting are connected.

"I primarily paint landscapes and cityscapes," he said. "Trying to understand character and texture of a place, which is something I worry about as an architect."

James Jones' exhibition's title, "Confessions of a Serial Painter," is a reference to his tendency to paint the same scene multiple times.

"The repeating and knowing what I'm doing is part of a larger understanding," Jones said.

"Confessions of a Serial Painter" includes six or seven distinct series. One of them is a series of paintings of crows.

"At one level they are very simple, bald, strong birds with raggedy feather groupings," Jones said. "But with their many poses they are expressive birds."

He said drawing and painting enhance sensitivity.

"Painting is a sanity outlet for the pressure of being the head of the architecture department," Jones said.

About 10 years ago when Jones thought he wasn't painting as much as he could, he set a goal of 50 paintings each year. He said in the past year he has created close to 100 paintings, many of which are large.

"Ironically I'm more productive as an artist now that I'm department head," he said.

Jones isn't the only professor of a discipline other than art who enjoys painting.

Clive Fullagar, professor of psychology, paints landscapes and figurative paintings such as portraits, and John P. Murray, professor of family studies and human services, primarily paints landscapes, but also does figurative paintings.

Fullagar said his landscapes are trying to rediscover land in Kansas.

"They are what you see if you look from the highway," he said. "I try to make it look like what Lewis and Clark might have seen."

But unlike Jones, Fullagar and Murray have no formal training in art.

Murray said he does not feel intimidated by his lack of formal training, because he doesn't have a reputation to worry about.

"No, I'm freed of that anxiety because I'm self taught," Murray said.

Fullagar said he's not competing with his art, and as a result doesn't feel intimidated.

"The work is more important than the end product," he said.

"People are more impressed when they find out I have no training as a painter, because my art is not primitive. I work in a very realistic style, and it's more accessible to the public."

Murray said he's not as technically skilled as he would like to be, but there are advantages to having no training.

"The advantage is there is no preconceived notions about what is good or bad," he said.

"My first painting was three feet by six feet, which everyone thought was strange because it was so big."

A watercolor painting made by James Jones titled "Whites of Their Irises" is on display at Strecker-Nelson Art Gallery on Poyntz Avenue.

Van Halen Sues Orioles

Van Halen is suing the Baltimore Orioles for at least $2 million, saying the baseball team reneged on a deal for a stadium concert featuring the rock band.

The Orioles approached Van Halen about performing on Sept. 2 at the team's Camden Yards, then backed out of the deal, according to a lawsuit filed Aug. 10 in U.S. District Court in Los Angeles. The action seeks damages for opportunities the band said it lost after it rearranged its schedule.

"In addition to using its resources to plan the concert, Van Halen had to change the dates of other scheduled concerts and forgo other concert opportunities in order to accommodate the Oriole Park concert," the suit claims.

The Orioles declined to comment. The band said the proposed deal would have paid $1.5 million plus 80 percent of ticket and merchandise sales.

The development marks a rocky start for the Orioles' efforts to bolster stadium revenue by bringing major shows to the 12-year-old ballpark.

Love Pleads Innocent to Assault

Courtney Love pleaded innocent Friday to a felony assault charge for allegedly attacking a woman with a liquor bottle in April at her ex-boyfriend's home.

The mercurial rocker, wearing a long black dress, was composed in court, responding to Los Angeles Superior Court Commissioner Dennis Mulcahy's questions with "yes" or "no" answers.

"I'm scared. It's scary," Love said. "I just want to play music, and being in that court and having a judge say 'the state of California versus me,' it's just scary."

Munch Paintings Stolen from Norway Museum

Armed, masked thieves burst into a lightly guarded Oslo museum Sunday and snatched the Edvard Munch masterpiece "The Scream" and a second Munch painting from the walls as stunned visitors watched in shock.

It was the second time in a decade that a version of the iconic "Scream," which depicts an anguished, open-mouthed figure grabbing the sides of its head, had been stolen from an Oslo museum.

The thieves, who fled by car, also grabbed "Madonna," another priceless painting that along with "Scream" is part of Munch's "Frieze of Life" series depicting themes of sickness, death, anxiety and love.

The two or three thieves, wearing black masks, threatened an employee of the Munch Museum with a handgun before grabbing the paintings, easily snapping the wires that attached them to the wall, witnesses and the police told the Associated Press and local media.

"What's strange is that in this museum, there weren't any means of protection for the paintings, no alarm bell," a French radio producer, Francois Castang, who saw the theft, told France Inter radio.

"The paintings were simply attached by wire to the walls," he said.

Church sponsors cultural dinner

Event raises awareness of diversity through fellowship, cuisine

By Lacey Storer
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The tables in the Trinity Presbyterian Church's Fellowship Hall were filled with people and culture Friday night.

Any table could hold students from seven or eight countries, as well as Manhattan community members. Dining on a mix of traditional American and ethnic dishes, attendees shared a meal and their cultures.

The dinner was put on by CrossRoads of Ecumenical Campus Ministry, a campus Christian organization. But on Friday the focus of the event wasn't religion, but rather exploring other cultures.

Randall Duval, an intern with ECM and one of the organizers, opened the meal by encouraging attendees to mix with each other.

"Sit next to somebody you don't really know and talk to them," Duval said.

"Talk to them, tell them your stories."

Duval, who is from South Africa, said he wanted the dinner to not only benefit international students, but residents of Manhattan as well.

"I think Manhattan is so far from a major metropolis, this gives students in Manhattan a chance to explore other cultures," Duval said.

Exploring other cultures was what drew Sarah Mitts to the event.

Mitts, junior in business management and American ethnic studies, said she came to the dinner because of her interest in other cultures.

"I'm very passionate about learning about other countries, different cultures and different people," Mitts said.

"You learn so much just by conversing with people," Mitts said, "and you make international friendships."

David Jones, campus minister for CrossRoads, said fostering friendships was one of the goals for the dinner.

Jones said having events like this helps welcome international students to Manhattan and make them comfortable in the community.

"Some of them are brand new, and they're away from everything familiar, family and friends," Jones said.

"It's a way for them to connect to here."

Hassan Raza, a graduate student from Pakistan, said events like this did help him feel welcomed to Manhattan.

"It helps you fit in better," Raza said.

"There are some really friendly people. You can talk to people and meet people."

"And that's the whole thing - you get a chance to know about other cultures, you get a chance to tell about your culture."

After dinner attendees were treated to more cultural experiences.

An African-American choir sang hymns, including one that had verses in three different languages.

Duval led a group that demonstrated capoeira, an African-Brazilian martial art form that was created by slaves from Brazil.

Jones said he was pleased with the turnout for the event and said there could be more events like this in the future.

"We hope to do it on a monthly basis," Jones said.

Overpayment rule uncertain to groups

By Leigh Strope
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Paychecks could surge or shrink for a few or for millions of workers across the country starting Monday, when sweeping changes to the nation's overtime pay rules take effect.

There is little agreement by the Bush administration, employer groups, labor experts and others on how many workers will gain or lose the right to overtime pay under the new rules in the Fair Labor Standards Act.

"Too be candid, no one knows," said Jerry Hunter, a labor lawyer at Bryan Cave LLP in St. Louis and former general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board during the first Bush administration.

Employers have sought changes for decades, complaining the regulations were ambiguous and out of date, and questioning why highly paid professionals should get overtime pay. Labor unions, however, say the new rules are intended to reduce employers' costs by cutting the number of workers who are eligible for overtime pay.

Estimates of how many workers will lose their overtime eligibility range from 107,000 to 6 million. Workers who could become newly eligible range from very few to 1.3 million.

"Not only is the Labor Department unsure, but a lot of people in a lot of industries are unsure," Hunter said.

"This is all very fluid right now."

The major overhaul, the first in more than half a century, is aimed at mostly white-collar workers. The Labor Department says manual laborers and other blue-collar workers will not be affected.

Center offers security for military Web sites

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA — The Air National Guard's Network Operations and Security Center is about to become an important part of the war on terror, offering Internet security for more than 300 National Guard sites around the country.

The center, called a NOSC, will service computer networks for more than 100,000 National Guard personnel, protecting the system from hackers and possible terrorist activity.

It will also work in conjunction with the Kansas Air National Guard's 161st Intelligence Squadron, which provides near real-time analysis of data gathered worldwide by reconnaissance aircraft.

The center will go online Oct. 1.

"It is a jewel in the crown for Wichita," said Col. Gary Wells, commander of the 184th Information Operations Group.

The NOSC at McConnell Air Force Base is one of only 12 in the world that has the capability of conducting computer war gaming and tactics training in computer network defense.

Both the NOSC and a future center for the intelligence squadron are being tailored for expansion as demand for the collection and analysis of information evolves.

The center is going through several weeks of testing to make sure everything operates the way it is supposed to, Lt. Col. Ross Flynn said.

Technicians will know where every one of its planes and crews is at all times.

Data controlling flight launches and in-flight refueling will be processed through the center.

The 161st already assesses intelligence at an interim facility at McConnell.

Ground for its permanent facility will be broken in the next 30 days, with construction of the $7.5 million center expected to take up to 18 months.

Just three years ago, the Flying Jayhawks faced extinction after the Air Force decided to retire one-third of its B-1B fleet and shut down the 184th.

The Air Force agreed to convert the 184th into an independent Guard unit handling air refueling and information operations.

When bids for NOSC came in at more than $7 million the Flying Jayhawks decided to take matters into their own hands.

They studied NOSC's for other military branches around the country, crafting a design using what worked well and discarding what didn't.

The result is a center built in one year for $1.5 million.

"This is a 'sunrise mission,'" Wells said. "That means it's a mission that leads the way into the future."

Residents prepare for anniversary

City to mark 150th birthday next year with events

By Sara Sandock
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Flashy lights, large buildings and people crowding the streets hurrying to get to work may not be a common image for Manhattan residents and K-State students.

Cheryl Collins, Manhattan Historical Museum director, said the first settlers in Manhattan were looking to find a second New York City or Chicago almost 150 years ago.

Although Collins said the town was established in 1857, the city actually was founded in 1855, which calls for a great deal of merriment in the year 2005, marking the 150th birthday of the city.

The year 2007 will be the official anniversary of the establishment of the city, however 2005 will be the anniversary of when the Cincinnati and Kansas Land Company headed up the Kansas River, she said.

Consequently, settlers decided to remain in the area, and the city of Manhattan was born.

Beginning on New Year's Eve, the city will be filled with exciting events that everyone is encouraged to partake in, Collins said.

Not only will next year mark Manhattan's 150th birthday; the entire Riley County area will be celebrating with videos, music, book exhibits, lecture series, parades and many more events.

"It will be a great opportunity for the neighbors to get to know each other as well," said Karen McCulloh, head of the events heritage committee.

She said one of the main goals of this celebration is to give people a picture of "what life was like before lights and flushing toilets."

McCulloh said the main event of the year long celebration is the national Chautauqua, an array of different speakers that dress up as famous historical figures and give a different educational insight about the past.

"A lot of people go to the Chautauqua. There is a different group every year that plan their summer vacations around this event," said Kenny Titus, junior in mass communications, who attended the Bleeding Kansas Chautauqua in Junction City last year.

"It was really neat to see people posing as famous historical figures," he said. "It makes history seem more realistic, and it was great to interact with the characters."

"People are showing a great deal of interest in the commemoration and everything from small businesses to local churches will be taking part in the events," Collins said.

College students, she said, have contributed a great deal to the rich history of Manhattan and are encouraged to take part in honoring the home of K-State.

Dole seeks Kerry apology for Vietnam statements

By Pete Yost
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CRAWFORD, Texas — Former Republican Sen. Bob Dole suggested Sunday that John Kerry apologize for past testimony before Congress about alleged atrocities during the Vietnam War and joined critics of the Democratic presidential candidate who say he received an early exit from combat for "superficial wounds."

Dole also called on Kerry to release all the records of his service in Vietnam.

Separately, President Bush's re-election campaign continued to deny links to Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, an anti-Kerry group running ads in three states, after the resignation of a campaign volunteer who appeared in the group's new ad.

With Kerry taking a break from campaigning, running mate John Edwards said Bush needs to tell the group to pull its ads, a step the White House and the Bush campaign refuse to take. The White House and Bush's campaign note that Kerry has benefited from more than $62 million worth of similar advertising against the president.

"This is the moment of truth for President Bush," Edwards said in North Carolina. "The American people have to hear directly that these ads need to come off the air." Kerry also fought back in another new ad.

Dole told CNN's "Late Edition" he warned Kerry about going "too far" and that the Democrat may have himself to blame for the current situation, in which polls show him losing support among veterans.

"One day he's saying that we were shooting civilians, cutting off their ears, cutting off their heads, throwing away his medals or his ribbons," Dole said. "The next day he's standing there, 'I want to be president because I'm a Vietnam veteran.' 'Maybe he should apologize to all the other 2.5 million veterans who served. He wasn't the only one in Vietnam," said Dole, whose World War II wounds left him without the use of his right arm.

Dole added: "And here's, you know, a good guy, a good friend. I respect his record. But three Purple Hearts and never bled that I know of. I mean, they're all superficial wounds. Three Purple Hearts and you're out."

Kerry campaign spokesman Chad Clanton said: "It's unfortunate that Senator Dole is making statements that official U.S. Navy records prove false. This is partisan politics, not the truth."

Other Kerry supporters also rose to his defense.

"Senator Kerry carries shrapnel in his thigh as distinct from President Bush who carries two fillings in his teeth from his service in the Alabama National Guard, which seems to be his only time that he showed up," John Podesta, former chief of staff in the Clinton White House, said on ABC's "This Week."

Local merchants offer discounts to K-State community

By Krystle Richard

With the flash of the purple Wildcat card, many would assume that great rewards would follow. However, student status does not always guarantee special privileges or discounts.

Cassie Luke, senior in business administration, said companies are oblivious to the advantages that would come from discounts.

"Maybe businesses don't realize how much money would generate if they offered student discounts," Luke said.

However, some companies feel their prices are low enough to not need a discount.

"We offer the best price in town to all customers, military family and students," Wal-Mart store manager Roy Hulet said.

Hulet, who has been a manager at the store for 21 years, said he doesn't believe in raising the prices of products in order to give discounts, specifically to K-State students.

Linda Howell, who has been with Walgreens at 325 Bluemont Ave. for more than two years, said though they haven't given any discounts to students in the past, they would like to do something in the future.

She said the company is considering something that may benefit K-State students, but as of now nothing has been set in stone.

"Students need a price point designed to fit their needs," said Rick Hernandez, owner of Domino's Pizza, 517 N. 12th in Aggieville.

Hernandez said he thinks such discounts are important because many students have limited income.

"Those are convenient ways that students can save money," Hernandez said.

Erika Meisel, senior in math and frequent Target shopper, said she agreed every discount is beneficial.

"I would travel across town if I knew I could get a better deal," Adrienne Dyskstra, senior in industrial engineering said. "Especially items related to school."

"Companies should try to help us. Many students are unaware of discounts, because businesses are quiet about it," she said.

Hernandez also spoke of a discount card available to students called the Collegiate Card. The card is sponsored by K-State Federal Credit Union. It includes more than 20 vendors that allocated a certain amount of discounts specifically to K-State students.

Advantage Computer Solutions offers 10 percent off merchandise with University I.D., Burger King offers 10 percent off, CD TradePost provides 10 percent off with a purchase of three CD's or more. Domino's takes 25 percent off the regular menu price of a pizza.

Subway, Zuckey Bowl, Java, Sonic, Pizza Hut and Long John Silver's also are a few of many vendors.

Any student, staff or member of faculty, administrator 16 years of age and older is eligible for the card.

According to the Web site, in order to receive the full discounts, the card must be presented prior to purchasing.

Guantanamo prisoners await preliminary trials

By Paisley Dodds
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

GUANTANAMO BAY NAVAL BASE, Cuba - One man allegedly worked as an accountant. Another, a poet, is accused of crafting terrorist propaganda. A third drove and protected Osama bin Laden. A fourth, a baby-faced Australian, fought with Afghanistan's ousted Taliban. None are accused of killing Americans.

These Guantanamo prisoners will be the first suspected terrorists arraigned in preliminary hearings this week before their cases go to military commissions, or trials, in an unprecedented judicial process that foreign governments, lawyers and human rights groups have criticized.

While the maximum sentence the four men face is life in prison, the military commissions - the first in nearly 60 years since the United States tried German saboteurs - will have the power to sentence others to death, and there is no independent appeal process.

Significant challenges already exist ahead of the first hearing scheduled for Tuesday. One defense attorney hasn't seen his client in four months because of a government delay in giving clearance to a translator. Another defense lawyer has withdrawn from the case after accepting another job, leaving her client with no representation. Others say the broad restrictions, which include the military's right to monitor conversations between attorneys and clients, will make it nearly impossible to win their cases.

"I've never gone into a hearing with so little information," said Lt. Cmdr. Charlie Swift, a military defense attorney representing Salim Ahmed Hamdan.

Hamdan, a 34-year-old Yemeni driver for Osama bin Laden, is scheduled to be arraigned first on Tuesday on a charge of conspiracy to commit war crimes for his ties to al-Qaeda.

Two of the other men face similar al-Qaeda conspiracy charges: Ali Hamza Ahmad Sulayman al Bahlul, 33, also of Yemen; and Ibrahim Ahmed Mahmoud al Qosi, born in 1960, of Sudan.

The fourth defendant is David Hicks, 29, of Australia, who faces the broadest set of charges - conspiracy to commit war crimes as well as aiding the enemy, and attempted murder for allegedly firing at U.S. or coalition forces in Afghanistan before his capture.

When many of the prisoners arrived at this U.S. outpost in eastern Cuba in January 2002, the Bush administration was quick to declare them guilty. "These are killers," President Bush said. Attorney General John Ashcroft described them as "uniquely dangerous."

After comments like those, critics doubt the detainees can receive a fair trial since top U.S. officials have the power to choose commission members.

"If the U.S. attorney would be able to handpick each jury, everyone in the world would say that is clearly not fair," said Kevin Barry, a retired Coast Guard captain and director of the National Institute of Military Justice.

The Bush administration defends the process.

"I think the commissions will be viewed with great interest, and over time, people will realize how full and fair they truly are," said Lt. Cmdr. Susan McGarvey, a government spokeswoman and one of the public affairs officers for the hearings.

PROPOSAL | Officials wary of security proposal

said.

A congressional aide, speaking on condition of anonymity, said there would be no CIA director, and the agency's parts would have new names under a new management structure.

Despite Roberts' assertion that he wouldn't abolish the CIA, some intelligence officials think that sounds exactly like what he is trying to do.

Some intelligence officials think Roberts' proposal is "unworkable and could hamper the nation's intelligence efforts at a critical time," said one, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the debate.

This official added that rather than eliminating barriers between agencies and bringing functions together, "it smashes them apart."

Last week, acting CIA Director John McLaughlin, a career agency employee, urged Congress to move carefully and argued there had been dramatic improvement since Sept. 11 in the sharing of information by various intelligence agencies.

Equally drastic changes were proposed at the Pentagon.

The National Security Agency, the nation's largest spy agency which intercepts electronic signals around the world, and the National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency, which analyzes satellite pictures, would be removed from the Pentagon and put under direct control of an assistant national intelligence director for collection.

The Defense Intelligence Agency's human intelligence collection activity would become a separate agency, like the former CIA directorate of operations.

another city, they don't need to search for a new church. Their membership is simply transferred to the AME church in that location.

Members of the Bethel AME church say their congregation is tightly tied to one another as well as the community.

Member Suzanne Mayo-Theus, described the connection in the congregation as one similar to the connections in Greek organizations.

"It's like a fraternity or a sorority," Mayo-Theus said. "It's very similar to that, but it's a spiritual connection."

Clyde Howard, another member of Bethel, agreed with Mayo-Theus.

"Churches typically should, I believe, be a supportive network of people you can turn to when there are difficulties," Howard, a member since 1992, said.

Bethel perhaps can be described best as a church that is as resilient as it is faithful. Over the years the church has seen hard times, with membership dropping as low as only five people.

Arlene Cole, a member of the church for more than 50 years, said the church has survived because of the dedication of its members to keep the church going. Cole recalled times when there wasn't enough money to pay the church's utility bills, so members of the congregation paid the bills with money from their own pockets.

Cole said she thought the resilience of Bethel AME made it unique from other churches.

"I think it's different because our church has been down to only five members," Cole said. "I don't what other churches are like, but I don't think they've had the struggles we've had."

STEM CELL | Research could help cancer patients

no longer of any value other than from a scientific standpoint, Weiss said.

These teams have been working with stem cells for five years. They first began by harvesting stem cells from pig and bovine umbilical cords and then furthered their research by studying the stem cells of different species including dogs and rats, Troyer said.

Within the last few years, they began to work with human umbilical cords that were donated by new parents. Most couples, the doctors have found, are very willing to help out with such donations to further science, Troyer said.

The stem cells harvested are from the umbilical cord matrix, which is the area between the blood vessels and the cord wall.

This process of harvesting stem cells from the cord matrix was pioneered by Troyer and Davis. The professors can harvest umbilical cord stem cells without controversy, and they can be taken instantly from an inexhaustible resource, Troyer said.

These umbilical cord stem cells are very similar to bone marrow stem cells. In contrast, however, the procedure for harvesting bone marrow stem cells is painful and invasive, whereas harvesting cells from the umbilical cord is simple, non-invasive and yields a larger amount of stem cells to be studied, Troyer said.

Another advantage of umbilical cord stem cells is that there is evidence "that these cells are very well tolerated when they're grafted, or put into another animal. They seem not to generate much of an immune response," Troyer said.

Davis said this new technology could be beneficial for cancer patients.

In tests of animals with cancer, the stem cells were inserted into a tumor where they could easily infiltrate the cancer cells, administering safe, effective cancer treatment.

Weiss said that learning about stem cells is critical to understanding several forms of cancer, not to mention other devastating illnesses.

The transition new students make at the start of the year can be overwhelming, said Dametria Steele, a junior in vocal music education who transferred from Wichita State University.

"Especially when you're new it can be hard to mingle with people," Steele said.

"The whole BSU environment is just fun and relaxed, so it's easy to talk to people," she said.

Cheering students lined the sides of a double-dutch jump-rope game, while others played volleyball.

Behind a row of tables with information about campus organizations, a group of students did a dance called a unity stroll to the tune of "My Goodies," by Ciara.

Mia DeGuzman said although she graduated in spring with a degree in human resources management, she came back Saturday to help recruit for Sigma Lambda Gamma, a historically Latina-based sorority.

"I wanted to support the diversity at K-State," DeGuzman said. "And also to see the people I knew and to meet the new young people."

Murder suspect enters plea of no contest

By Scott Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Defendant Jerry Gavin pleaded of no contest to first degree murder Monday. Lori Coleman, Judge Larry Miller's court reporter, said Gavin entered his plea at the Riley County Courthouse. Gavin had been suspected in the 1999 murder of Leonardville, Kan., resident Opal Trumpp. The hearing was not originally slated to be on Miller's schedule Monday, but Assistant Riley County Attorney Brenda Jordan and Steven Rosel, Gavin's defense attorney, were able to reach an agreement over the weekend, Coleman said. Coleman said the second count of the indictment was dismissed. Sentencing is scheduled to take place at 9 a.m. Sept. 9, Coleman said.

Severe storm hits Manhattan

Severe storms Monday night forced students and residents to take cover. The National Weather Service reported an estimated four inches of rain fell during the storm that included both a tornado and a flash flood warning. Chad Conyack, junior in architectural engineering, said he went downstairs to take cover in his neighbor's ground level apartment. "The horrible wind, the heavy downpour - I knew from experience what to do," he said. "Then I heard the sirens." Conyack does have experience. In 1991 his house was damaged in a tornado in

Willingham leaves basketball program to stay with family

By Josh Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sophomore point guard Dez Willingham has left the K-State basketball program, Coach Jim Wooldridge announced Monday. After averaging 4.4 points and 2.8 assists and starting in several of the 22 games in which he played during his freshman campaign, the once highly-touted Wooldridge recruit was expected to start at point guard for the Wildcats this upcoming season. Willingham's decision came as a shock, Wooldridge said. "We got word a week ago Monday, he wasn't coming back," he said. "We had no idea Dez had entertained this kind of thought." Wooldridge said he had spoken to Willingham two or three times this past week about the point guard's future in the program. In the end, though, Willingham opted to stay closer to his family in DeSoto, Texas. "I really felt like we had a good relationship," Wooldridge said. "Our conversations were Before 2nd Lt. Michael Goins went to serve in Iraq, he called the local florist. Every week, his wife, Paula, received a bouquet of flowers to remind her of his love. On Wednesday, Aug. 11, Goins, a 2003 K-State graduate, was hit by shrapnel in Iraq and suffered facial wounds. He called his wife, and they decided together that he would stay to command his soldiers despite his injuries. "He was given time to heal and at the first opportunity he thought he was fully capable, he discharged himself and went right back into action," said Lt. Col. Art DeGroat, commander of the Army ROTC Wildcat Battalion. "He stopped long enough to call his wife to tell her he was OK. He was being awarded a purple heart for that, but never got it pinned on him because he was back with his platoon." That Sunday, while fighting al-Sadr insurgents, Goins was shot and killed while driving his tank. "All of the hundreds and thousands of cadets I have dealt with, Lt. Goins was absolutely a very unique and special person," DeGroat said. "He was an absolute role model about what a scholar, athlete and warrior should be. He was the most compassionate commander, loving gentleman I have ever met." Because Goins graduated in May 2003, many of the cadets never knew him. But Jonathan Hawkins, junior in history and ROTC cadet, remembers. "He was a great officer, great soldier and a great husband," he said. "He's somebody everybody here looked up to and respected. And now, we aspire to be like (him)." After graduation, Goins went to Fort Knox for training and ended up at Fort Hood, which is where he was serving when he received deployment orders. "He had this sense of duty, and it cost him his life, but it's a decision he made," Hawkins said.

The cadets in the ROTC program, although shaken by the death, are even more dedicated to fighting for their country, Hawkins said. "It definitely hit home harder. When you see the names on the news, it's always someone else's son, someone else's friend or someone else's cadet," he said. "When it does come back and it's one of your friends, it does hit home a little harder." But Hawkins said that only reaffirms his commitment to the Army and his country. "Everybody that goes into the military knows that's a risk, and it's something we are willing to accept," he said. "We are all willing

Long lines for football ticket pickup as fans anticipate start of new season

A silent hand rose, beckoning the next person in line, as droves of students showed up yesterday at Bramlage Coliseum to pick up their football tickets. At one point the line was all the way down the southwest entrance ramp, almost to the parking lot. Craig Ackerman, junior in biology, said waiting in line was definitely worth it. "K-State football is about the second-best reason to go to K-State," Ackerman said. "K-State football itself is awesome. (Waiting) doesn't seem that horrible, especially since I have nothing else to do." Monday was the first day ICAT and general admission tickets were available for pick up by students. Student reserved tickets were available last Saturday. Bob Howell, athletic ticket manager, said it was usual to see a large crowd on the first day, and thousands of students were expected to arrive. "We usually get the bulk of them, because these are the kids who didn't order them online or get them when they enrolled," said Howell. "They're doing that today because they're afraid they're going to run out." Students also could pick up tickets for four of their friends, but a student ID was required for each person, Howell said. Waiting time to pick up tickets varied on how many people were in line, how many needed to pick up tickets, and how many wanted to buy them. Wait times on Monday averaged

Ask a loaded question, get a loaded answer — that's just what happened when I asked for the responses to the question, are athletes treated differently than other students? If so, is this acceptable considering the revenue they bring to K-State and the time commitment required for athletes?

ty's image, and that image is what brings other students to K-State.

Responses on the other end of the spectrum included the opinion that if we treat athletes in a special way, we should treat all students who participate in extracurricular activities in the same way. Should we treat students specially who are leaders in their organizations or clubs?

Some of you voiced the opinion that athletes and other students who pursue their interests in these activities choose to make these commitments, and they shouldn't be treated any more special than any other student here at K-State who is working hard with his or her studies.

Something I think we all should think about is that we all are students, and we all are working hard to get that degree, whether we're involved in extracurricular activities or not.

The fact that we have made a commitment to higher learning should grant us special treatment from one another.

Next week's topic: Do we have two different university settings at K-State in the greek and independent living environments?

I want to thank the student body for the overwhelming response to this controversial topic.

The responses have shown me these are the kinds of issues that you, the reader, would like to see more of in the Collegian.

Getting to this week's topic — I read all of your e-mails and listened to your responses and came to the conclusion that this is a very divided issue among K-State students. I realized all of you have a stake in this topic, and that's what prompted your response to it.

Some of your responses seemed to indicate that treating athletes with special treatment is fair because of the time commitment and effort it takes to play a major NCAA Big 12 sport.

Some feel it is fair because athletes represent the universi-

Missouri instates sales tax holiday

Clothing, software among items exempt from weekend taxes

By Chaz Steimel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Last weekend business in Missouri received a boost. Part of that boost was Kansans shopping in Missouri.

From 12:01 a.m. Friday to 11:59 p.m. Sunday, certain goods were exempt from sales taxes as part of a tax holiday.

According to the Missouri Chamber of Commerce, these sales tax exempted goods included clothing, computers, software and other school supplies.

Without having to pay sales tax, Missouri suddenly became more attractive to Kansans as a shopping destination.

The sales tax holiday is designed to aid families with school aged children and college students.

Missouri became one of 12 states this year to offer such a sales tax holiday.

Other states include Texas, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Iowa, Massachusetts, New York, North Carolina, South Carolina, Vermont, and Virginia.

Marlee Carpenter of the Kansas Retail Council explained that Kansas had tried to pass such a law two years ago.

"In 2002 the Kansas Senate passed a sale tax holiday law; unfortunately it was too late in the legislative season, and it did not get passed in the House," said Carpenter.

In the City of Manhattan, the local sales tax is 7.3 percent — 5.3 percent is a statewide tax, 1 percent is county tax, and another 1 percent is city tax.

Last year, Manhattan collected more than $8 million in sales tax in its own city and county taxes.

According to the Kansas Department of Revenue, the state of Kansas collected more than $1.5 billion in sales taxes for fiscal year 2003.

Cory Sears, sophomore in speech communication, understood that a sales tax holiday would help him out.

"Take, for instance, someone buying a new computer. If someone were to buy a $1,400 dollar computer, then not having to pay 7 percent in sales taxes would save them a hundred dollars," Sears said.

According to the National Retail Association, the average family with a child in school spends nearly $500 on school-related items.

The average college students spend more than $600 in necessary school supplies, with many students spending thousands of dollars.

Representative Sydney Carlin of Manhattan acknowledged that the cost of school is significant.

"In Kansas there are no exemptions for sales tax," she said.

"A sales tax holiday would be one way to give back to families."

Officials voice disapproval of Roberts' CIA proposal

By Katherine Pfleger Shrader
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON - A key Republican's proposal to break up the CIA and rearrange the Pentagon's spy agencies under a national intelligence director met immediate and broad resistance Monday.

A top Senate Democrat called it a "severe mistake," and the agency's former director said it showed a "dangerous misunderstanding of the business of intelligence."

Critics began aligning to fight the proposal that would represent the most significant overhaul of U.S. intelligence operations since the CIA's 1947 inception — and the most sweeping plan offered in the post-Sept. 11 debate.

President Bush did not endorse the proposal by Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman Pat Roberts, R-Kan. Instead, the president said only that he was interested in finding, "the best way to fashion intelligence so the president and his Cabinet secretaries have got the ability to make good judgment calls."

Bush has supported the need for a national intelligence director but has yet to detail the powers he wants the office to have.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said he hadn't had a chance to see the restructuring proposal in writing.

"We do need to make significant adjustments in how we collect, communicate and dispense information," Rumsfeld told an audience of about 1,300 troops Monday at Fort Bliss in El Paso, Texas.

But he added, "we have to be careful about it. You don't want, in the middle of the war, to go tearing up the pea patch."

Roberts surprised Republicans and Democrats alike when he announced on a Sunday morning talk show his proposal to remake the intelligence community by splitting the CIA into three separate agencies, pulling all or part of four defense intelligence agencies out of the Pentagon, and creating a new national intelligence director to oversee the National Intelligence Service he envisions.

On Monday, a defensive Roberts said, "If this proposal seems radical to some, my response would be, what should we do?"

More than three dozen attempts to reorganize the intelligence community over more than five decades have failed, he said, adding that he spoke last week with colleagues of both parties, and eight of his panel's nine Republicans have agreed that Congress must act. Democrats, meanwhile, criticized Roberts for not working in a more bipartisan fashion on the 139-page draft bill, and demanded more details.

Lawmakers who handle issues ranging from intelligence to banking are expected to offer proposals to revamp the intelligence community, prodded by a report from the Sept. 11 commission that offered more than 40 recommendations for such an effort.

Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio, called Roberts' bill a "bold proposal" that conforms to what the commission recommended: Put one person in charge of the intelligence community.

"Is this where we will end up? Probably not exactly, but it's a good place to start the debate," DeWine said.

Former CIA Director George Tenet, in his first public statement since retiring last month, also moved to discredit Roberts' proposal, saying it "reflects a dangerous misunderstanding of the business of intelligence."

Faculty members get involved in area politics

By Joanna Rubick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State faculty and staff members at K-State are getting involved in politics in various degrees.

One such person is James Sherow, associate professor of history, who is involved with the Democratic Party.

Sherow said it is important for everyone to at least get out and vote.

"It's pretty alarming to have such a small percentage of voters deciding elections," he said. "It's important for everyone to become involved."

Since our government is based on "We the people ...," Sherow said it takes people to be involved for the government to work.

"If people don't participate, you kinda get what you deserve in some respects," he said.

"Part of being an educated citizen is taking this knowledge and education that you have and striving to make your community a better place."

Mark Taussig, university landscape architect, is contributing to the community as a city commissioner.

"I'm a long-time resident of Manhattan," he said. "I'm just trying to make a contribution to make Manhattan a better place to live."

Taussig, who affiliates himself with the Republican Party, said those elected into office can affect people's lives.

"Who we have as our elected officials can make a big difference in your community," he said.

Carol Gould, director for the Kansas Center for Rural Initiatives, said she used to be more involved in politics, but now she just contributes money to the Democratic Party.

However, she was city commissioner from 1999-2001 and has participated in campaigns in years past.

Gould said it is not enough just to vote.

"It's unfortunate how low our voter turnout is, but it's got to be more than just voting," she said. "If you're not involved, don't complain."

Laurie Bagby, associate professor of political science, is the county precinct chair for the Republican Party, a position Taussig once held.

She said she tries to contribute when she can, since she is a professor, wife and mother.

"I try to do what I can at the local level," she said.

Politically active professors strike delicate balance

Activism is a vital part of any democratic society, and apathy is an adversary to progress.

Professors and staff members have every right to be politically active. Such actions are noble but should be kept outside of the classroom.

As an institute of higher learning, K-State should foster an environment of creative thinking where students are not only encouraged to think for themselves, but provided with the analytical skills necessary to do so.

Such community involvement is a benefit to students, individuals and the community as a whole.

Activism in the community can provide experiences and contacts that improve the learning environment at K-State.

However, such involvement should only be undertaken with the utmost of professionalism.

Professors bringing their thoughts and opinions into the classroom in an inappropriate manner would not be conducive to the educational environment of the university.

Often, if a professor were to bring his or her political perspectives into the classroom, the students, whether in agreement or not, can be harmed in the learning experience.

Professors and faculty members, such as Laurie Bagby, Mark Taussig, Carol Gould, and James Sherow, as well as numerous others on campus, should all be commended for the tireless efforts to maintain an objective learning environment at our university while still contributing valuable time and energy to our community.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Death of objectivity

Balanced news reporting becoming a rarity

ALTAF KARIM

God made the right wing and probably the left wing too, but "The O'Reilly Factor" was certainly the work of the Devil.

It is quite amusing that Fox News still hammers viewers with the slogan "Fair and Balanced." We all know it's not a propaganda virgin anymore, especially after broadcasting Bill O'Reilly.

His hypocritical language, loaded with misleading statements, is eating at me badly. It seems the man wouldn't be caught dead with truth and rationality.

On a Jan. 17, 2003, broadcast of the Fox News Channel he stated, "We hope you depend on us for the truth, because we're going to report the situation in Iraq without an agenda or any ideological prejudice."

But on a June 17 broadcast, O'Reilly said, "... And I don't have any respect, by and large, for the Iraqi people at all. I have no respect for them. I think that they're a prehistoric group that is - yeah, ... we cannot intervene in the Muslim world ever again. What we can do is bomb the living daylight out of them, just like we did in the Balkans."

According to journalist Thomas Wheeler, "The Fox News host has a history of making racist remarks and advocating the mass murder of civilians. Once, O'Reilly commented 'Problems continue for the U.S. Military in Fallujah. Why doesn't the U.S. Military just go ahead and level it?'"

Fox News is not an isolated case of yellow journalism, but it stands as a headstone to the death of objective news.

Other mainstream media like CNN also fall in the same category for a serious lack of objectivity in their news coverage, particularly with regard to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

In October of 2000, when CNN's Cairo bureau chief Ben Wedeman was shot in Gaza, CNN was hesitant to report who was responsible for Wedeman's death. Robert Fisk, a British journalist reporting from Gaza, concluded the bullet must have been fired by Israeli soldiers on the other side of the Gaza.

During those few weeks, scores of Palestinians had been killed by Israeli troops in the Gaza area as well.

The news media continues to justify killings by Israel as state military action, while Palestinian violence is reported as "terrorism."

American reporters often adopt loaded terminology, and in doing so they help shape public opinion. Calling Yassa Arafat a terrorist and Ariel Sharon a prime minister makes all the difference in how their actions are perceived.

The public also should be aware of the political perspective of the sources used in a reporting. Often, the bias of the news media is reflected in the choice of sources.

A report from Fairness and Accuracy In Reporting found that in the month before the Iraq war was launched, only 17 percent of the sources used by the four main news programs were skeptical of the war.

Be aware; the media can influence you without you knowing, especially when it starts working in cooperation with the government.

For example, the current reporting from Iraq is far from objective. Most of the people in key positions in the current U.S.-installed Iraqi government, including Interim Iraqi Prime Minister Iqad Allawi, also have worked for the CIA for several years.

However, their images are being projected by the news media as true representatives of Iraqi people. On the other hand, people with far more popular support, like Muqtada Al-Sadr, are not being portrayed as heroes of the common man or freedom fighters, but as terrorists.

Media resources like the Al-Jazeera network have been banned by the new interim Iraqi government. The reason is simple; Al Jazeera was presenting the point of view of the "other side," and many common people as well.

Biased policies like suppressing independent media will not help to bring the democracy to Iraq anymore than they will in the United States.

While some suggest that biased media will make Americans more informed, the truth is that neither Fox News nor Air America truly represents what is good for America.

The two extremes don't work together to produce objective truth; they divide America and push policies away from the middle ground where compromise and unity can be found.

They cause us to focus on our differences - on ideological issues like abortion and gay marriage - instead of on things we can all agree on, like improving schools and protecting human rights.

People want reality, not bias. News media should be unfailingly honest and unmerciful as a mirror that tells nothing but truth.

Altaf is a graduate student in physics. You can e-mail him at opinion@pub.ksu.edu.

CHAZ STEIMEL

If objectivity is the key-stone of American journalism, then why is USA Today the most popular newspaper in the country?

Surely the New York Times or Boston Globe would be the choice for people interested in reading the most objective, informative news source.

In reality, people (especially students) are not interested in long dry articles - we get that from our work.

People want more out of their news. People want a news source that tells it like it is.

Some have taken this decline of objective news as a sign of the coming apocalypse, or at least another example of our society's decline into McWorld.

In truth, the increase in biased news is only an evolution of the American news media, and in many camps a welcome change away from the mere facade of objectivity that preceded it.

News media has never been completely objective, nor will it. Assuming that we have objective news today, or have ever had it, is a little like believing the earth is flat.

For example, at a conference of 8,000 journalists this summer, clear political affiliations were evident. A standing ovation awaited Presidential candidate John Kerry, but hisses and catcalls for President Bush.

Objectivity at its finest. Liberals know that they can look to the New York Times for left-leaning features. People who watch Fox News, of course, expect a conservative bias.

Perhaps the reason for the movement away from objectivity lies in an observation by Jay Harris, publisher of Mother Jones, who noted that much of the broadcast media has become merely sensationalist and superficial.

According to Stewart Bailey, co-producer of "The Daily Show," this watering down of the news media has driven viewers to aggressive shows with an edge, like "The O'Reilly Factor."

Biased shows are more rhetorically charged, attracting viewers who could not care less about Britney Spears' latest fling or Paris Hilton's lost dog.

Probably the best aspect of biased shows is that they appeal to younger viewers. According to the Pew Research Center, people under 30 learn as much about current events from "The Daily Show," as they do from "Nightline."

Even if "The Daily Show" is not as thorough as "Nightline," at least they are tuning in.

And not all biased news is poor news, either. Some of the best news out there comes from groups with clear political views.

The Economist magazine (which some consider the best news magazine in the market today) has an admitted bias towards economic liberalism.

News sources from around the world are rarely more objective than U.S. sources. Take Al-Jazeera for example. The major difference is that many Americans believe their sources are, or at least should be, objective.

In reality, America should remember that even if the New York Times' motto is "All the news that is fit to print," we should read it "All the liberal news that is fit to print."

The solution to biased news reporting is the same as it was 10 years ago. Consumers who want to make a balanced judgment on an issue need to get their information from multiple news sources.

By reading sources that lean either direction, people can become more informed about both sides of an issue than by reading only "objective" news.

The more diversity you have in your source list, the more likely your ideas will not be as convoluted as Rush Limbaugh on Oxycontin.

The real problem in the American media is not bias. It is the lack of discourse amongst its members and the failure of Americans to seek out views they might disagree with.

Political humorist P.J. O'Rourke noted that the real shortfall for American media is not its lack of objectiveness, but its lack of persuasion.

O'Rourke contends that many news sources, instead of seriously discussing issues on a case by case basis, will espouse one set of ideas and ignore everything to the contrary.

We can have all the biased news and objective news that we can handle, but if we do not sit down and discuss our ideas, then the real downfall of our civilization, as it is with some many families, will not be from Britney Spears or Bill O'Reilly, but from the lack of conversation.

Jardine complex renovations set to begin early next year

By Ashley Friesen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Jardine Apartment Complex renovation project, which will exceed $100 million in cost, is slated to break ground in spring 2005.

According to a press release by the Department of Housing and Dining Services, Gossen Livingston Architects of Wichita should have a master plan completed by December.

The idea behind the project is to offer students a variety of university housing opportunities in the community setting, said Chuck Werring, director of housing and dining services.

"When we started to look at the future of housing here at K-State, it became very obvious that we need to provide more opportunities for students who live on campus to experience different lifestyles," Werring said.

The project will increase the housing density from 552 to 808 units. This will be accomplished by razing and replacing about half of Jardine's 24 apartment buildings, built between 1957 and 1963, and renovating the rest.

"Age is a very big factor in renovating," said Skyler Harper, assistant director of facilities management for Housing and Dining Services. "The buildings are not meeting the current needs of our students."

"We are doing this to be able to serve our students, so they can live on campus if they desire for their whole K-State career."

Jardine currently is unable to accommodate technological demands and is very expensive to maintain, Harper added.

Upon completion, Jardine will offer apartments, townhouses, on-site parking, green spaces, community facilities, an academic center and retail facilities.

Specific details concerning the retail facilities and other amenities will be decided in the design phase, Werring said. The Frith Community Center will be renovated to house various programs.

"That is an area where we would hope we could do a little of the academic programming," Werring said.

The physical changes to the property will be joined by a renewed sense of commitment to community, which will drive the project to meet the needs of the Jardine community.

The renewed commitment will be conceptualized into four community cornerstones: they include tradition, education, global and imaginative. All of these represent the ongoing commitment to enhancing the quality of life for those who live on campus, said Stephanie Bannister, assistant director of apartment living for Housing and Dining Services.

"The cornerstone idea came from the thought that we really wanted a set of guiding principles that would see the project through. It sets a tone for the people that will live in Jardine but also for the people who work on the project, including the architect and the contractors," Bannister said. "That's the best way we could think of to let those people know who we are."

"Basically, they represent who we are and what we want to be. They speak to the traditions we have but also the vision we have of what we become," Bannister added.

Because Housing and Dining does not work from a budget large enough to fund the renovation project, they have found an alternate source of funding.

The project will be funded primarily from bonds issued to K-State by the Kansas Development Finance Authority along with private contributions, Werring said.

"We're an auxiliary enterprise, which means that we do not receive any money from the state, we do not receive money from K-State, we do not receive money from local funds or the city," Werring said.

"All of our money is generated from the rent rates that students pay and through our summer conferencing."

The bonds will be paid back during a period of 30 years using student housing fees, Werring added.

WILLINGHAM | Players vie for opening on Wildcat roster

between two people who had personal respect for each other. It just came down to Dez wanting to stay with mom and dad, and that outweighed his commitment to K-State."

Wooldridge said he did not believe any other collegiate programs were courting Willingham and was not sure if basketball was in Willingham's immediate future, though he said the guard was planning on enrolling in a junior college in the DeSoto area.

"The most frustrating part about this is the timing of it," Wooldridge said.

What about the possibility of Willingham coming back to the program?

"I don't even think that's in the ballpark," Wooldridge said. "On the flip side of that, our program will move forward."

Willingham is the second highly-regarded player to leave Kansas State during the Wooldridge era.

Guard Nick Williams transferee after his freshman year in 2001-02, to the University of Cincinnati after averaging 9 points, 2.7 rebounds and 2.5 assists per game.

WILDCATS ADJUST

The loss of Willingham creates another question mark in the K-State backcourt, as the squad already was adjusting to the losses of departed senior guards Frank Richards, Jarrett Hart and Tim Ellis.

However, the Wildcats still have six guards on the roster who will be competing for increased playing time, including junior Schyler Thomas, sophomores Lance Harris and Fred Peete, freshmen Curtis Allen and Clent Stewart and senior walk-on Mark Frederick.

K-State is practicing in preparation for a four-game exhibition tour, Oct. 8-12, in British Columbia.

The tour will be an opportunity to work on adjustments to the backcourt, Wooldridge said.

"It's going to give us a chance to experiment a little and look at different kinds of combinations," he said.

When asked who was likely to fill Willingham's spot, Wooldridge said freshman Clent Stewart could be the man.

"Essentially what it does is move Clent Stewart into that spot," he said.

The 6-foot-4 guard from Broken Arrow, Okla., has the capability to play both the point and shooting guard positions, said Wooldridge.

"I've always had a good feeling about this kid," Wooldridge said.

"If you want to give Clent a name, he's a combo guard who leans more toward the point.

"The only downside is he's very young," he said.

As for Wildcat player reaction towards Willingham's decision, Wooldridge said the team obviously was disappointed.

However, Wooldridge added he believes his squad's hard work over the spring and summer will still translate into a good year.

"They understand and believe they can have a successful season," he said.

Wooldridge said he would not be surprised if people doubt the Wildcats' capabilities after losing Willingham but feels his team will still compete at a high level.

"I know there's people out there who are going to look at this and say we're through," he said.

"I don't believe that's true."

Olympics

Third straight gold for U.S.

ATHENS, Greece - They are America's newest golden girls - powerful and just a shade from perfection.

Cristl Bustos set an Olympic record with five home runs, including two Monday, in Athens.

The U.S. softball team won its third straight gold medal with an unprecedented and nearly unblemished romp through the Olympics, capped by a 5-1 victory Monday over an Australian team, that, like the rest of softball's elite, never had a chance.

The Americans zeroed in on a gold medal, and were four outs from a tournament-long shutout before the Aussies scored a run - the first given up by the U.S. pitching staff in 54 2-3 innings.

Duncan, U.S. advance

ATHENS, Greece - Before the hard part begins against Spain, Tim Duncan and the U.S. basketball team got to experience a taste of what the good old days were like at the Olympics.

Finally playing an opponent they were able to handle with ease, the Americans finished off the preliminary round with an 89-53 victory over Angola on Monday.

The Americans had to wait until Greece defeated Puerto Rico 78-58 in Monday's final game to learn their next opponent - unbeaten Spain (5-0). China earned the final medal-round spot from Group A by upsetting Serbia-Montenegro 67-66 behind 29 points from Yao Ming.

The other quarterfinal matchups will be Greece-Argentina, Puerto Rico-Italy and China-Lithuania.

U.S. now aims for gold

IRAKLION, Greece - Deep into overtime, and maybe the last time for the Fab Five of U.S. women's soccer, the breaks were going against them.

A last-gasp goal that stole victory in regulation, a wide-open shot that bounced off the goal post.

Then, the only teenager on the team came to the rescue.

Heather O'Reilly, who had Mia Hamm posters on her wall just a few years ago, scored in the ninth minute of the extra period Monday to give the United States a 2-1 victory over World Cup champion Germany and a place in Thursday's Olympic gold-medal game.

The win gives the Fab Five - long-standing stars Hamm, Julie Foudy, Joy Fawcett, Brandi Chastain and Kristine Lilly - a chance to go out as champions in their final tournament together.

Hamm takes silver

ATHENS, Greece - Italy's Igor Cassina edged out American Paul Hamm in a tiebreaker to win the gold medal Monday in the high bar finals, an event marred by a 10-minute delay while fans booed the score of Russian star Alexei Nemov.

Cassina and Hamm each scored 9.812. Isao Yoneda of Japan won the bronze and Nemov finished fifth.

Hamm's routine was delayed by nonstop booing after Nemov's score of 9.762 was posted. Hamm and his coach, Miles Avery, finally had to motion Nemov, a four-time Olympic gold medalist, to the podium to ask the crowd for quiet.

Hamm's medal goes with the all-around gold he won, a medal that has since been disputed by the South Koreans.

Hamm's medal goes with the all-around gold he won, a medal that has since been disputed by the South Koreans.

Gold stripped from Russian

ATHENS, Greece - Russia's Irina Korzhaneiko was stripped of her shot put gold medal Monday, the first athlete of the Athens Games to lose an Olympic title because of doping.

Korzhaneiko, 30, the first woman to win a gold medal at the sacred site of Ancient Olympia, tested positive for the steroid stanozolol after Wednesday's competition. The backup B sample confirmed the initial finding.

Selig is the cause of decline of baseball

ANTHONY MENDOZA

Bud Selig will never be recognized as one of the greatest commissioners in Major League Baseball.

He might even be remembered as possibly the worst in the history of the game.

He's the man who cancelled the World Series in 1994, locking out the players after they went on strike with less than a month to play in the season.

Not only was it the first time there was no World Series in 90 years, but it destroyed the Montreal Expos' franchise, which was on the verge of greatness with a core group of players: Larry Walker, Pedro Martinez, Moises Alou and Marquis Grissom.

The club that showed promise prior to the strike now faces the prospects of a move to Washington, D.C., or even extinction.

Selig is the same guy who stopped the 2002 All-Star Game after both teams ran out of players. This ended the game in a tie - a move which didn't sit well with viewers.

As much as Selig has messed with America's pastime, he also is the man who revolutionized the game and gave fans a reason to watch in September with the introduction of the wild card.

Last year the Kansas City Royals even had a shot at making the playoffs for the first time in 18 years. There wouldn't have been much of a reason to watch a Royals game late last season, like there was to watch a clash at Wrigley Field or Fenway Park, if the wild card did not exist.

Entering the stretch run toward the playoffs, every division except one has at least a four-game lead on their closest divisional rival.

In the American League wild card race, three teams are within one game of one another. In the National League it's a three-team race with the San Diego Padres trailing the Cubs by 2.5 games.

The last two World Series have also been won by wild card teams.

In 2002 the Anaheim Angels beat the National League Wild Card San Francisco Giants in seven games. The next year the Marlins took down the New York Yankees in seven games.

Call Bud Selig whatever you want; Budget Bud or any four-letter expletive you can think of. He knows baseball is no longer America's No. 1 sport.

That belongs to football.

Popular NFL video games face one another on the market

By Jay Dillon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In the evolving world of high-tech computers, video games and video-game systems are everywhere.

Not only are systems competing with each other for sales, but video games themselves are competing as well.

EA Sports released the latest version of the John Madden sports franchise with Madden NFL 2005 on Aug. 10.

Madden 2005 is available on Game Cube, PlayStation 2 and X-box. It sells for $49.95.

ESPN 2K5 was released July 20 only on PlayStation 2 and X-box and is priced $19.99 - $30 cheaper than Madden 2005.

"Madden 2004 was one of the highest-selling video games of the year last year," Wal-Mart store manager Roy Hulett said.

The first week is usually the biggest for video games and with the return of students, sales went up.

"Our second week this year was actually bigger than our first week," Hulett said. "When students came back to town, sales went up."

Madden was released on X-box this year with X-box Live capabilities for the first time. ESPN was also released with X-box Live capabilities, which means gamers can play online against other people playing the same game.

Donna Beadle, spokeswoman for Sam Goody, said neither game has affected the other one in sales.

"Both games are selling above expectations, and they aren't hurting each other," Beadle said.

"ESPN is expanding the market for professional football video games, people are buying both or one or the other, both are selling well above expectations," she said.

Matt Dehaan, sophomore in computer science, bought ESPN 2K5 after watching a friend play.

"I thought it looked good," Dehaan said. "I think it has better graphics and it was a lot cheaper."

The lower price of the ESPN game has not stopped avid Madden players.

Michael Howard, senior in industrial engineering, still bought Madden 2005.

"I've bought other copies of Madden before, I'm an avid fan," Howard said.

"It's a fun game, its enjoyable, good group activity and its something to pass the time."

Even with the cheaper game available, Howard went with the EA Sports product.

"I'm loyal to EA because you get what you pay for and you know what you're getting," Howard said.

Club softball gears up

By Kelly Olson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Telling someone they throw like a girl might be a jab at one's ego - with the exception of the women's softball club, that is.

The team is hot coming off last season performance and is ready for more action this fall.

Finishing third last year at the National Club Championship Tournament in Los Angeles, Calif., the ladies are ready to get back in the dirt to finish first.

"K-State was the number-one seed in the tournament and could easily have come away with the title. Getting ready and getting the money to return will be a monumental task," head coach Richard Baker said. Baker said a tough slate of games will test his talented squad.

"To get us ready, I have worked to set up our toughest schedule yet. Many of the ladies that play on the Kansas State club could have played elsewhere, but wanted to come to Kansas State for their education," he said.

He said it can be tough, because most schools have an intercollegiate program that offers allowances. At K-State the team must raise their own funds due to its club-sport status.

For the tournament last year, the women raised money through various fundraising methods such as selling doughnuts.

The women composing the team, despite their differences, are bonded by the passion for softball.

"We have been working so hard every day to get better and better and gain more recognition as a team. We really appreciate the support that we are given. Everyone should come and watch some Wildcat softball," said Stephanie Fairbanks, sophomore in secondary education and biology.

Fairbanks, who plays second base, as well as short stop, said there is no one team that will put up the biggest challenge.

"It is most challenging knowing every girl on some of the other teams are there on scholarship and practice and condition every single day," she said.

Old-school sounds

Northern State improves on lyrics, themes

"All City"

Album review by Matt Groneman

Female rap trio Northern State first established its sound with the 2003 album "Dying In Stereo." Their second album, "All City," improves upon all their trademarks.

"All City" is filled with old-school, East-Coast beats that sound like something off a Beastie Boys album: loads of pop culture name-dropping, word-for-word borrowing from other compositions; and a healthy serving of feminist and political themes.

The new album is an improvement in all areas.

On "Dying In Stereo," the verses consist of stone-cold rhyming against a steady beat, but the hooks and choruses busted the album's flow. On "All City," the group blends well, and the choruses never detract from the verses, adding to them instead.

Another improvement in the hooks is that the lyrics often change from chorus to chorus. One or two lines will remain the same, but the rest of the chorus will change, allowing the hook to take on different meanings each time it is heard.

The beats are not only improved in the chorus, but are stronger all around. Guest producers add extra-flavor in this area of the album, particularly such talents as Muggs, who has had success on his own and as a member of Cypress Hill, and Questlove, drummer for The Roots.

"All City" has no shortage of relevant references to current events or pop culture either. "Don't Look Now," a key track on the album, talks about Rocky Balboa, "Bridget Jones's Diary" and smoking up with John Kerry.

Some tracks borrow word for word from other works of art, creating the feeling of an intimate conversation with them.

"Ignite" steals "while your pillows of feathers turn to blankets of lead" from Bob Dylan's poem, "Last Thoughts on Woody Guthrie," while "Don't Look Now" opens with a line from the Eagles' "Peaceful Easy Feeling."

This album's biggest strength and biggest area of improvement for

Courtesy Art

Northern State, is in the themes of the songs.

On "Dying In Stereo," the songs mostly just boasted about the women's rap skills with an occasional reference to politics or feminism; on "All City," feminism is the key concept.

The girls still have some mad boasts in their repertoire, such as when they claim other "MCs getting fatter than a three dollar bill" in "Ignite." The best part of this boast, though, is that they back it up by discussing the reason for the fakeness - the contradictory themes of loving your mother and abusing your girlfriend that reach through much gangster rap.

The cohesiveness that can be found in "Ignite" - the kind which mixes the boasting that is characteristic of rap with in-depth and insightful criticism, is found throughout "All City."

The lead single, "Girl For All Seasons," is perhaps most effective in this manner. The song is a harsh critique of the cult of fashion pushed by such magazines as "Cosmopolitan."

Here's a taste of what I'm talking about: "There ain't nothing you could buy in a fancy bottle that'll ever let you love your own reflection. Girl, close that magazine with your introspection."

The girls finish that verse with the powerful assertion that "This is Northern State, not Girls Gone Wild." Northern State has an attitude that's hard to miss, and much needed in the world of hip-hop.

!!! successfully mixes genres

"Louden Up Now"

Album review by Mark Sibilla

There is a revolution going on in the independent music world, and it goes by the name of dance-punk.

For years, indie rockers have been afraid to shake what momma gave 'em and we're happy listening to music in closed rooms with headphones wrapped tightly around their ears.

However certain bands such as the Rapture, Liars, Hot Hot Heat, etc. are bringing back the jerky-funky rhythms of bands such as the Pop Group, Talking Heads, and Gang of Four and have been mixing them with a disco sensibility.

This produces music that may be lyrically fluffy but has a beat that will get even the deepest-rooted wallflower onto the dance floor.

One of the latest bands to emerge and make a splash is the New York seven piece ensemble that goes by the moniker of "!!!"

(pronounced chk chk chk) (POW POW POW) (unguh unguh unguh) etc. reads the sticker on the front of the CD case).

Last year, !!! released a 12-inch single titled "Me and Giuliani Down By the School Yard (A True Story)," a nine-minute dance epic that sets up a groove and then layers endless polyrhythms on top. This year, !!! follows it with the album, Louden Up Now, ten songs of unadulterated disco-punk.

Each song relies upon the similar formula set by "Me and Giuliani," - laying down a groove and then exploring all the possibilities that can be had with it. What is created is an album that is excitingly fresh, aggressive and completely danceable.

My favorite thing about !!! is that they bring back the hedonistic side of both punk and dance music. This is very apparent on the first single, "Pardon My Freedom," a first amendment rant. Front man Nic Offer yells over a killer bass line, jittery guitar line and excellent rhythm section about karma coming back upon the pigs in Washington and he will be "like I give a f*ck/like I give a sh*t about that f*ck." The song has enough expletives per minute to rival a Quentin Tarantino movie.

Most of the songs are politically charged with no prominent figure going unturned.

When !!! doesn't want you to do much more than dance your ass off, you can't help but abide.

Jackson album unforgettable "Off the Wall"

Album review by Mark Sibilla

"Off the Wall" was Michael Jackson's breakthrough album, introducing his own brand of falsetto disco, R&B, soul, pop and funk to the world. While "Thriller" became the more successful album, I adamantly argue that "Off the Wall" is the best album Michael Jackson ever released.

In "Off the Wall," Jackson creates an unforgettable style that would influence pop music for decades to come. The first bass lines of "Don't Stop 'til You Get Enough," coupled with Jackson's howl, could get even Christopher Reeve shaking it. The subsequent numbers bring the party to its peak with undying beats.

Courtesy Art

The album slows down for the ballads, which Jackson has said was "what made 'Off the Wall' a Michael Jackson album." And it doesn't get any more heartbreaking than "She's Out of My Life," where Jackson reportedly broke down and cried after finishing a take.

With any other artist, we would become sick with schmaltz, but Jackson sells the song with true hurt and loneliness. The album then slowly picks up to "Burn This Disco Out," an explosive finish to an already stellar album.

Emeritus professors enjoy status

K-State faculty receive campus benefits for years of service

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For the first time in 31 years, Lew Shelton, professor of speech communication, theater and dance, didn't have to spend his summer planning for the upcoming school year.

"If I was directing a play in the fall, I'd be meeting with designers, and I'd spend the month before school to plan my syllabi," he said. "The work never stopped over the summer."

"I didn't have to do that this summer, and I didn't miss it at all."

Shelton is one of 36 staff and faculty members who already retired and were granted emeritus status.

Emeritus status is granted to retired professors, who receive benefits such as office space and a parking pass and spending as much or as little time on campus as they want.

Section D-70 in the university handbook defines requirements for the title.

"Faculty and unclassified professionals who have completed at least 10 years of honorable full-time service at K-State shall be designated at the time of their full retirement by an emeritus title equivalent to their highest rank or title," according to the handbook.

The diagnostic medicine and pathobiology department conferred emeritus status on two faculty members this year.

Department head M.M. Chengappa defined honorable, full-time service as, "exemplary, and contributing tremendously to the growth and development of the department."

"They're good citizens who go out of their way to do good work," he said.

He said some faculty already given emeritus status come to department meetings and listen to seminars given by experts in the field on a frequent basis.

"We interact with them on a professional and social level," Chengappa said. "But the professional aspect is more important; they have done a lot and we want to maintain contact and that continuity."

"They should feel good about this place, because they contributed tremendously," he said.

George Kennedy, who spent the last 26 years as a pathologist for the department, recently received emeritus status.

"It's something you focus on for 40 years and would like to stay involved because you trained for so long," he said.

"Then to suddenly not be involved creates an empty spot," Kennedy said he definitely is not bored.

His wife Stormy is the owner of Claflin Books and Copies, and Kennedy said has spent a lot of time working there since he retired.

"I still feel a kinship with K-State even though there is not a direct involvement," he said. "I want to maintain that because I feel welcome."

Since new emeritus faculty members just received their titles a few weeks ago, Kennedy said his retirement just feels like a vacation.

"I haven't really had a chance to see how things work," he said.

"So far the best part has been being able to sleep in," he said.

Bush ad criticizes Kerry's tax record

Kerry ad attacks president's credibility in response

By Liz Sidoti
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON - President Bush's campaign criticizes rival John Kerry's record on taxes - and questions the Democrat's character - in a new campaign ad that says "there's what Kerry says and then there's what Kerry does."

The ad shows the Massachusetts senator at his nominating convention last month saying, "We won't raise taxes on the middle class."

"Really?" the ad says. It then claims that Kerry has logged 98 votes for tax increases and supported boosting taxes on gasoline, middle-class parents and Social Security benefits.

The commercial started running Monday on national cable networks and in local media markets in most of the 19 states where Bush is on the air. A similar radio ad also will run.

Kerry's campaign responded that Bush's attack "should come as no surprise" and is used "to cover up a Bush vulnerability."

"After all," the campaign said in a memo, "that's what presidents do when they have no credibility or ability to address the real issues facing the American people."

Meanwhile, Kerry's campaign was to start running a new ad Monday in West Virginia, Ohio and Wisconsin, where the Republican-backed Swift Boat Veterans for Truth aired its first ad criticizing the Democrat's war record.

Starting Tuesday, the group will run a new commercial in three other states - New Mexico, Nevada and Pennsylvania - assailing Kerry for his anti-war activities after returning from Vietnam. Kerry's campaign has not bought airtime to broadcast ads in those states, but officials are considering doing so.

Kerry's response ad for West Virginia, Ohio and Wisconsin says Bush's campaign "supports a front group attacking John Kerry's military record." Bush's campaign sent stations a letter saying that the ad contained a "false and libelous charge." By law, candidates can say whatever they want in ads and stations have to air them.

While there is no evidence that Bush's campaign is behind Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, there are ties between Bush aides and the group. However, there also are ties between Kerry's campaign and liberal groups running anti-Bush ads.

On Monday, Bush denounced TV ads by outside groups attacking both Kerry and himself and called for a halt to all such political efforts.

Army officer to plead guilty in case of prisoner abuse

By David Dishneau
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

HAGERSTOWN, Md. - The highest-ranking Army reservist charged with abusing Iraqi detainees at Abu Ghraib prison said Monday he will plead guilty to some offenses because, as he explained, "what I did was a violation of law."

Staff Sgt. Ivan L. "Chip" Frederick II, of the Maryland-based 372nd Military Police Company, said in a written statement e-mailed to the Associated Press by his attorney: "I have accepted responsibility for my actions at Abu Ghraib prison. I will be pleading guilty to certain charges, because I have concluded that what I did was a violation of law."

The three-paragraph statement did not specify the charges to which Frederick will plead guilty, and it wasn't clear whether he would contest any of the allegations.

He is charged with maltreating detainees, conspiracy to maltreat detainees, dereliction of duty and wrongfully committing an indecent act.

Frederick, 37, of Buckingham, Va., has a pretrial hearing scheduled for Tuesday in Mannheim, Germany.

His civilian attorney, Gary Myers, did not immediately respond to e-mailed questions about Frederick's case. Telephone calls to Myers' hotel room in Mannheim went unanswered.

Frederick, a Virginia state prison guard in civilian life, is among seven members of the Cresaptown, Md.-based 372nd charged in the scandal, which involves physical abuse and sexual humiliation of prisoners.

He would be the second of the seven to admit wrongdoing. Spc. Jeremy C. Sivits of Hyndman, Pa., pleaded guilty to three abuse charges in May and was sentenced to a year in prison.

Frederick, who worked as a prison guard in Virginia, was the senior enlisted soldier at the Abu Ghraib prison between October and December, when the mistreatment allegedly occurred.

Frederick is accused of having helped force a prisoner to stand on a box with wires placed on his hands, a scene displayed in one of the photos from the prison.

Frederick's charge sheet says the prisoner was told he would be electrocuted if he fell off the box, although the wires were not connected to a power source.

Frederick also is accused of forcing naked detainees into a pyramid position and photographing the scene.

He also allegedly ordered detainees to masturbate in front of other prisoners and guards, posing two detainees to simulate oral sex while photographing them.

One photo from the prison shows Frederick standing behind a naked prisoner smeared with feces. Frederick's mother, Jo Ann Frederick, has said the inmate spread the feces on himself.

She said on Monday that she did not know what offenses her son planned to acknowledge.

"I can only say that Chip has told us things, and it's not that it was so much hands-on things, but he is responsible for what some of the others did, and some of the things he did he feels were not right," she said.

Frederick has claimed the abusive treatment was orchestrated by military intelligence officers rather than MPs, according to a diary his family made available.

In his statement Monday, Frederick said he hoped "all those within the Army who contributed to or participated in the chaos that was Abu Ghraib" accept responsibility.

He also expressed concern about Spc. Joseph M. Darby, a member of the 372nd credited with tipping off Army investigators to the abuse.

Relatives of Darby said last week that he is in protective military custody, partly because of threats from people in their communities who believe he betrayed his fellow soldiers.

Munch's missing masterpiece raises security questions

Whereabouts of 'The Scream' remain unknown as officials explore protection options

By Doug Melgren
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

OSLO, Norway - The brazen daylight theft of Edvard Munch's renowned masterpiece "The Scream" left Norway's police scrambling for clues and stirred a debate across Europe over how to protect art if thieves are willing to use deadly force to take it.

Some expressed fears that works of art are in increasing danger from violent raids - unless, as Norway's deputy culture minister put it, "we lock them in a mountain bunker."

On Sunday, armed, masked robbers stormed into Oslo's Munch Museum in broad daylight, threatening an employee with a gun and terrifying patrons before they made off with a version of Munch's famous painting "The Scream" and another of his masterpieces, "Madonna."

A day after the theft and despite many tips, police said they have no suspects, no trace of the paintings and no theory on a motive.

The getaway car and the picture frames were found by police in Oslo hours after the robbery. The car's interior had been sprayed with a fire extinguisher to cover up any clues, and Inspector Iver Stensrud of the Oslo police said it could take days to clean up enough to find forensic evidence.

The most likely motives, according to the Norwegian news media, are a ransom or to impress other criminals, since the paintings are so famous that they would be all but impossible to sell.

Whatever the motive, Munch Museum director Gunnar Sorensen appealed to the robbers to "please take care of the paintings, no matter what else you do with them."

Another of the four versions of "The Scream" was stolen from the National Gallery in Oslo on the opening day of the 1994 Winter Olympics in Norway. Its thieves demanded a ransom but were caught in a sting and the work was recovered after about three months.

"The Scream," an icon of modern alienation, depicts an anguished figure who appears to be screaming or shielding his ears against a scream. "Madonna" depicts the virgin as eroticized and mysterious, with a blood-red halo.

The lightly-guarded Munch Museum has silent alarms and security staff. However, in a country where even police do not routinely carry weapons, there would be little that unarmed museum guards could do to stop at least three robbers that seemed ready to use their weapons.

"It is food for thought that the spiral of violence has now reached the art world," Deputy Culture Minister Yngve Slettholm told the Associated Press. "This is a first for Norway, and we can only be glad that no one was hurt."

Armed robbery is rare in Norway.

Slettholm cited a bank robbery in Stavanger in April in which heavily armed criminals shot and killed a police officer, a rare occurrence in a country where fewer than 10 officers have been killed on the job since 1945.

So, he said, the only way to totally protect great art would be to lock it away in a bunker out of public view.

Officials said there were no immediate plans to improve security at the Munch Museum.

"We can't see that any mistakes were made. We also can't see that the evaluation we had ahead of this has been wrong," said Lise Mjoes, director of the Oslo municipal art collections. "If we only thought about security, then we would have to place the pictures in a vault, but then they aren't accessible."

The dilemma is shared by many museums in Norway and abroad.

"We cannot lock up our pieces of art because we want to show them to a large audience," said Sune Nordgren, director of the National Museum of Art in Oslo. He said having armed guards would only result in thieves outgunning them.

In 2001, thieves raided Sweden's national museum and cut down a self portrait by Rembrandt and two paintings by Renoir. Those paintings were hanging from steel wires, like the paintings in the Munch museum.

Jan Birkehorn, head of security at the National Museum in Sweden, said it's almost impossible to make paintings theft-proof without ruining the experience for visitors.

"Should you put them inside security monitors with thick glass? I think the experience of looking at them would be lost," he said.

He also said he does not believe in having automatic metal bars that would close to keep thieves inside the museum because thieves "may take a hostage."

"We are very aware of the changing world and the threats that face us, and therefore we have recently renewed all our security measures," said Soili Sinisalo, director of the Finnish National Gallery's main art museum, Ateneum. "Security must be airtight. That's the only way to make sure that nothing is stolen."

Sinisalo said the museum is retraining all its approximately 100 staffers in security and has placed cameras in each exhibit room.

In general, museums are very tightlipped about security, saying secrecy is one of their greatest defenses.

"We can't talk about our security system because that would be like giving an instruction manual to someone who wanted to steal something," said Clemence Goldberger, spokesman for the Rodin Museum in Paris.

Spain's main museums have armed guards and metal detectors. "We had a series of measures that are visible to the public but others that are secret," said spokesman Jose Maria Ambrona for Spain's Prado museum.

France's Musee d'Orsay has extensive and largely secret security systems, in addition to guards and metal detectors.

But even that would not stop a violent robbery such as the one in Oslo.

"Museums are never completely safe from such a theft. If an armed gang came into the museum with machine guns, there's not a lot that can be done," said museum spokeswoman Nicole Richy.

TICKETS | Ticketholders remain patient in lines for football tickets despite long wait, arriving early between half an hour and 45 minutes.

After picking up her general admission tickets, Erin Hoppock, sophomore in elementary education, said she waited for about 45 minutes.

"We had to stand outside," Hoppock said. "I just thought this was the only time we could come get them, from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. today."

Tickets will still be available for pick up the remainder of this and next week from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. at Bramlage.

David Shanholtzer, junior in wild life biology, said he waited half an hour to get his tickets, but that it was necessary.

"You have to do what you have to do," Shanholtzer said.

Sadie Culver, junior in kinesiology and pre-physical therapy, bought ICAT tickets.

"You have to order (ICAT tickets) early when you enroll," Culver said. "So mostly upper-classman get them. It's kind of a benefit of being an experienced college student."

The atmosphere when people picked up their tickets was always exciting, Howell said.

"We really look forward to this because it kind of an exciting time for us too," Howell said. "It's fun to see all the kids come in and be excited about football."

Dan Ruehl picked up his tickets so he would not have to worry about it later. He said the way in which tickets were distributed worked fine.

"I don't see a problem with it," Ruehl, freshman in biology, said. "People want their tickets, so of course there's going to be a line."

WEATHER | Refuge sought on campus during storm

Haysville, Kan.

What really made him worried was that his fiancée, Courtney Sprecker, nursing student at Highland Community College, wasn't home, Conyac said.

Sprecker was experiencing the other part of the storm – flash floods.

"I was driving home from class and Anderson was so flooded, everyone was turning around and going the other way," she said. "I turned around and ended up by the mall, but it was everywhere."

Sprecker said she was scared, but most of all she was worried about Conyac because she didn't know where he was.

"I was crying all the way here," she said.

Residents of Moore Hall also dealt with the storm.

Elizabeth Townsend, community assistant at Moore Hall, said the staff worked together to inform the students about the storm.

"We moved everyone off the ninth, eighth, seventh, sixth and fifth floors," she said. "If people insisted on staying in their rooms we didn't stop them, because they are adults and can make their own decisions, but we strongly recommended it."

Townsend said students were in the basement for about one hour and kept themselves entertained.

"We had several people playing poker or watching TV in the basement TV room," she said. "Other people were just hanging out and talking to friends or watching the storm."

Students on campus sought refuge in buildings, such as the basement of the K-State Student Union, until the warning ended at 8:30 p.m., 40 minutes after it had begun.

The storm then moved west, toward Lawrence and the Kansas City metro area.

State climatologist Mary Knapp and representatives from the Riley County Police Department and Manhattan Fire Department were unavailable for comment.

to accept that sacrifice for the people in this nation to enjoy the freedoms they have today."

In helping his students cope, DeGroat said he has an open door but doesn't try to hide the reality of war.

"It's always been my philosophy that anyone that wants to command soldiers as an officer, early on in that goal, they have to realize and be exposed to the reality that making the ultimate sacrifice of dying for your country, because it's a part of what we do," he said.

"I make no efforts at all to mask it or de-emphasize it," he said.

And now, K-State's cadets have a role model who made that ultimate sacrifice.

"He's everything you'd want a young lieutenant to be," DeGroat said.

Athletic department renovates facilities for new season

Chris Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Pat Agwu sprints out of the blocks during the men's 400-meter dash last spring at the Ward Haylett Invitational. This was the first meet on the new track. Officials in the athletic department are making improvements to many K-State athletic facilities, including construction of a locker room and office complex for the track and field teams.

Behind the scenes at the athletic department, officials are busy with several facility improvements. "There are some big improvements and little improvements," associate athletic director Casey Scott said. "Students will notice a few things, but most of the things being done, students may not notice."

During the coming months, the athletic department plans to begin several projects and finish others that are near completion. Scott said the majority of the upcoming facility improvements were funded through private donations — either annual or major gifts.

Some of the future projects set to begin are phases four, five and six of the Vanier Football Complex, construction of a locker room and office complex for the track and field teams and the resurfacing of the tennis courts at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Also, the rowing teams' new $1.1 million boathouse, which is still under construction, will be completed in the fall.

Scott said phases four, five and six of the planned projects for the Vanier Football Complex include renovation of the Wildcats' locker room and lounge area, adding more office space for the coaching staff and medical staff and adding terrace seating in the north end zone at KSU Stadium.

"The cost of the football complex is going to run from $2.5 to $3 million," Scott said. "We are still in the process of fundraising."

Powder thought to be from K-State

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A white powdery substance suspected to be from K-State was swallowed Monday at an accident scene in Omaha, Neb.

Sivaprakash Natarajan, Manhattan resident, swallowed the substance and told police it was from the university.

The chemical swallowed was cyanuric chloride, a common ingredient found in herbicide.

The FBI is investigating the accident; however, there is no suspicion of terrorist activities.

Ronnie Grice, assistant vice president for public safety, said no evidence has been found at K-State.

"This individual that was involved in the accident said he got it from here, so we are checking into it," Grice said. "There hasn't been anything reported to us as missing or stolen."

Eric Maata, head of the chemistry department, said he also has not noticed anything missing.

"I did some checking with our chemical safety officer, and there is no evidence of anything missing," he said.

Maata said all chemicals in the chemistry department are strictly stored and have restricted access.

"Labs are locked, and the chemical storage facility is always locked," he said. "I'm hard pressed to imagine how it could have come from the chemical department."

"Our chemicals are stored according to the type of compound, and there is nothing on the container to identify it was from K-State."

Natarajan was sent to the hospital after the accident and was listed in serious condition Tuesday according to the Omaha World-Herald.

Meth lab found in Riley County

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Four people were arrested Monday at a methamphetamine lab in Riley County.

Two adults and two minors were taken into custody in Leonardville, Kan., after police found equipment and chemicals used in the manufacture of methamphetamines.

Alice Y. Mosburg, Leonardville, and Vance E. Mossburgh, 3207 Anderson Ave., were arrested for manufacture and possession of methamphetamine with intent to distribute, possession of ephedrine, child endangerment, unlawful acquisition of drugs and no drug tax stamp.

Each was released on $25,000 bond.

Two juveniles also were taken, arrested and turned over to juvenile intake officers.

Fear strikes when Russian airliner crashes, 2nd breaks apart in air

By Mike Eckel
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BUCHALKI, Russia — A Russian airliner crashed and another apparently broke up in the air almost simultaneously after they took off from the same Moscow airport Tuesday night, officials said, raising fears of terrorism and leaving little hope that any of at least 89 people on board could have survived.

Authorities said rescuers found wreckage from a Tu-154 jet, which was carrying at least 46 people, about nine hours after it issued a distress signal indicating an attack and disappeared from radar screens over the Rostov region some 600 miles south of Moscow. At about the same time that plane disappeared, a Tu-134 airliner carrying 43 people crashed in the Tula region, about 125 miles south of Moscow, officials said. The Emergency Situations Ministry later said that everybody on board the Tu-134 was killed.

The planes had left Moscow's Domodedovo airport within 40 minutes of each other Tuesday night and disappeared from radar screens about 11:00 p.m., officials said.

President Vladimir Putin ordered an investigation by the nation's main intelligence agency, the Federal Security Service, and security was tightened at airports across the country.

Authorities have expressed concern that separatists in war-ravaged Chechnya could carry out attacks linked to this Sunday's election to replace the region's pro-Moscow president, who was killed by a bombing in May.

Rebels have been blamed for terror strikes that have claimed hundreds of lives in Russia in recent years.

Witnesses reported seeing an explosion before the first plane crashed. Suspicions of terrorist involvement were compounded by the reports the Tu-154 airliner that went missing in southern Russia's Rostov region issued a signal indicating the plane was being seized.

Citing an unidentified source in Russia's government, Interfax said the signal came at 11:04 p.m., shortly before the plane disappeared from radar. Emergency and Interior Ministry sources in southern Russia, speaking on condition of anonymity, also told The Associated Press a distress signal had been activated.

College network does battle with MTV

Illustration by Jeff Yeung | COLLEGIAN

The U Network, a new college TV network based at Ball State University, is combatting what its representatives say is a monopoly on college-age TV viewers by MTV.

U Network organizers say their programming will be more "intelligent" and contain less "sexed-up" content. Programming will include shows that encourage more political activism by students, as well as reality shows and the nation's first collegiate news network.

U Network's rival, mtvU, aims at more than 700 colleges nationwide.

LOSE SOMETHING?

Attorneys in New Hampshire last week uncovered 14 missing patents in the Rauner Special Collections Library at Dartmouth College.

The patents, which date back to the Industrial Revolution, include plans for an internal combustion engine, an integral invention that ushered in the age. Some of the items bore the signature of historical figures such as John Quincy Adams and George Washington.

According to the patent attorneys, the items were likely created on or before 1836, when many other original patents were destroyed in a fire.

Whenever patents are discovered, they usually are retrieved by the United States Patent and Trademark Office. However, library officials said they plan to send digital scans to the office and retain the originals.

TAKING A WALK

Incoming freshmen at the University of Nebraska in Lincoln have yet another tradition to go through as they begin their college careers.

A new tradition called the 'column walk' was established by alumni of the university. During the walk, members of the Student Alumni Association direct freshmen to walk through the columns of the university's stadium. The tradition represents the freshmen's introduction to the campus; when they graduate, they walk through the columns once again.

This year, the first year of the tradition, saw only about 100 students participate in the event.

BROTHER, CAN YOU SPARE SOME CASH (FOR FOOTBALL TICKETS)?

Shortages of football tickets at Louisiana State University in Baton Rouge, La., have led to action by the school's Tiger Athletic Foundation.

The private organization's funds provide tickets for its members, and officials say the group's services are needed — it sold 3,000 tickets after the 62,000 available were sold out.

A minimum donation of $50 is required to join TAF, which bases access for its members on a point system — the higher the donation, the more points received. The highest level requires a $5,000 donation, which gives members access to athletic events.

BIRTH CONTROL PILL DEATH

Last week, 19-year-old Nicole Beth Bryla was buried after she died from a lung complication physicians believe is related to the birth control pills she was taking.

Bryla, who died Aug. 12 and was a student at the University of Texas-Austin, was rushed to an area hospital after a passerby saw her collapse outside. Doctors determined several blood clots had formed in her legs and traveled up to her lungs.

Physicians said the condition, called pulmonary embolism, exists but is rare and that the symptoms appear mild at first but progress quickly.

Feed attracts ag students

Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For the first time in more than 35 years the College of Agriculture watermelon feed was moved from its regular spot in front of Waters Hall.

Originally scheduled to be at University Gardens for the first time, the event was moved to the front lawn of Weber Hall because of Monday night's rain.

Jackie McClaskey, assistant dean of the College of Agriculture, stood at the gardens for about half an hour directing students to the new location.

"Even with all this new electronic communication, we can't reach everyone," McClaskey said.

McClaskey said the event was switched to the gardens because the Department of Horticulture offered the location to the College for the event.

"It was a great opportunity to expose the students to the gardens; many of them don't get to see them," McClaskey said. "If it would not have rained so much last night, this would have been a beautiful location to have our event."

The event is set up to let the students in the College of Agriculture learn about campus activities and meet other students, McClaskey said.

"At K-State, we always talk about how much of a family atmosphere we have," McClaskey said. "The College of Agriculture is like that, too."

ture is like that, too.

"We had the chance to show the students it is not just about the classes."

Christine Soukup, council watermelon feed chair and junior in agricultural economics and agriculture, said she made an effort to distribute fliers and send mass e-mails.

Soukup said the turnout for the event was high, and freshmen in an orientation class were required to attend.

"I still think everyone had lots of fun," Soukup said.

Kristin Pfannenstiel, junior in landscape design, said she had gone to events like the feed and found it helpful.

"I found out about some organizations," Pfannenstiel said.

McClaskey said the event always has been a success, and the goals always have been met.

"Everyone has welcome events, but this is a great chance for agriculture students to meet other students and find out what they can do in the college besides classes," McClaskey said.

Monday thunderstorm floods Manhattan streets, businesses

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Torrential thunderstorms Monday night left damage on Campus and in the Manhattan area.

Mary Knapp, K-State climatologist, said 4.98 inches of rain fell Monday.

According to the Associated Press, the storms stretched from Manhattan to Johnson County.

The rains flooded at least one room of Boyd Hall, said Jamie Leopold, junior in English literature.

"The residents were taking huge garbage cans of water out," Leopold said.

The room was located in the basement.

K-State Police communications specialist Jason Blackburn said officers reported no unusual activity connected to the storm Monday night on campus.

"There was nothing out of the ordinary," Blackburn said.

"Officers on duty did the same things they would have done any other night."

The storm left some Manhattan streets still pocketed with rain Tuesday morning.

Laurie Harrison, assistant director of Riley County Emergency Management Services, said the worst flooding was seen on Third Street and Bluemont Avenue.

"It nearly went into the Dairy Queen on 3rd Street, and the cars at Briggs looked like they were floating the next morning," Harrison said.

Jim Gaidos, marketing manager for Briggs Auto Group, said although there was high water at the location near the airport, no damage had been done, and the low elevation has caused high water to rise in the past.

"We were nervous, but we moved the cars, and no damage was done. This happens every four to five years," Gaidos said.

Loren Root, manager of the 3rd Street Dairy Queen, said no damage was done to the store, but the water was only about three feet from the store entrance.

"The ground lies pretty low out there and we see flooding, but nothing was harmed here," Root said.

Harrison said the water receded throughout the day. But, he added, another storm on Tuesday or Wednesday could cause the same street flooding as Monday's storm.

"We have had a really wet summer," Harrison said.

"There is nowhere else for the water to go when it rains as hard as it did."

There were no reports of wind damage, Harrison said, but there were some instances of lightning strikes.

"We had a few problems with lightning, but there were no significant structural problems caused by the storms," Harrison said.

TO THE POINT Officials must act quickly in abuse scandal

The Pentagon's top officials should not only take responsibility for the Iraq prison abuse scandal, but respond with appropriate reforms.

An independent commission report released Tuesday, placed blame not only on the soldiers supervising the prison, but senior leaders as well, including Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's office.

The report blamed understaffing, inadequate supervision and poor training for the soldiers' actions in Abu Ghraib prison.

While soldiers are responsible for their individual actions, top officials hold the ultimate accountability for the abuses.

Soldiers are committing human rights violations in the name of the U.S. military. This hypocrisy will not be tolerated.

Leaders set the standards and expectations for groups. It is obvious that the Pentagon's leadership failed.

Strong reform must take place, or the United States' reputation and international relations will continue to suffer. Inaction will harm the reputation of the United States, which, in the eyes of the American public, has been tainted too many times in the past.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Tainted by porn

I must start this column by saying that I am not prone to prudishness.

But having a porn store just down the road from where I live and go to school is where I must draw the line.

Don't get me wrong. I'm just about as open minded as they come. I don't have a problem with pornography, as long as it's legal. If you like it, feel free to get your jollies any way you can.

What I do have a problem with is the kind of element it brings to a community. Manhattan is not the most exciting place in the world. There's little to do besides go to the bars and drink on the weekends, but it's a nice town.

However, several studies have shown that adult entertainment businesses cause what are known as "secondary effects" in the surrounding community.

Among these effects are lowered property values, neighborhood deterioration and a higher crime rate.

Manhattan has seen a rise in sexual assaults recently, and law enforcement officials have encouraged residents to take as much precaution as possible to safe-guard themselves from dangerous situations.

Yet studies show that the existence of sexually-oriented businesses increase the occurrence of sex crimes in a community.

For example, a study of Phoenix, Ariz., found that the occurrence of sex offenses is 506 percent greater in areas where sexually oriented businesses exist. Is that something we really want?

Land use studies also have shown a tendency in residents to stop shopping in areas near adult entertainment businesses.

Negative perceptions of the area and attempts to prevent minors from being exposed to sexually explicit material cause this behavior and may lead to economic decline.

In order to combat these negative secondary effects, most counties and cities in the United States place zoning restrictions on adult businesses.

The Manhattan City Commission is proposing adult-oriented businesses be restricted to areas zoned C-5 (highway service areas) or I-2 (industrial park areas). Also, a 500-foot buffer zone between the establishment and its surroundings has been proposed.

These ordinances and restrictions limit the construction of adult businesses to mainly industrial areas, where secondary effects are purported to be least harmful.

In Manhattan, the main industrial area is on the east side of town, on or around McCall Road. This area is also near Northview, a large neighborhood with a grade school.

While a public nudity ordinance passed in October of 2003 bans strip clubs in Manhattan, the Supreme Court has deemed it unconstitutional for a community to ban all adult-oriented businesses. City Commission must make it possible for them to exist.

I'm having a little trouble understanding the rationale of our commissioners.

They didn't want adult entertainment businesses built right outside Manhattan city limits, because they didn't want visitors to form a bad opinion about our wholesome, football-loving, all-American community.

Instead, they've decided to have one built inside the city limits, hidden away in some skanky part of town where it will have a greater effect on nearby citizens.

The placement will likely devalue property in the area and may increase the occurrence of sexual assault. How is that a better solution?

Frankly, outside the city limits would be a better place for it. Then we wouldn't have to worry much about its effect on our community, especially minors.

An even better choice would be not to have one in our town at all. Nearby towns with adult stores are close enough that if porn a necessity for you, it's not that much of an inconvenience to drive a few miles.

But for those of you inclined to do so, think of nearby towns with adult entertainment establishments. What are your opinions of these places? Would you want to live there? Do you want people feeling this way about Manhattan?

I like to think that the pride we have in our town is deserved. I'd also like to keep it that way.

Hate crime legislation gives government too much control

Acts show perpetrators' ignorance, but laws still stifle free thought

In the quest to build a more tolerant America, one foolish strategy being pushed by those on the left is harsher punishments for what are deemed "hate crimes," a pointless act that gives the government power over what people think.

A hate crime is defined in several congressional bills as "an incidence of violence motivated by the actual or perceived race, color, national origin, religion, sexual orientation, gender, or disability of the victim."

Any decent human being will agree all are entitled to equal protection under the law. Fair treatment for all members is a necessity in building a stable society.

But hate crime legislation doesn't help with that. It doesn't provide any real deterrent because hate crimes are more likely to be impulsive and emotionally motivated than other violent crimes. According to www.religioustolerance.org, hate crimes are more likely to be committed by strangers to the victim.

We all can agree that people who commit hate crimes are much more ignorant and not as concerned for the consequences of their actions as the rest of us. Their hearts are not going to be swayed by threats of larger prison sentences.

After all, most criminals think they'll get away with it.

This is the United States of America, where the First Amendment guarantees the freedom of speech. If you're allowed to say whatever you want, what about what goes on in your mind?

As James Carville, political advisor to Bill Clinton and left-wing co-host of CNN's Crossfire, said, "This is America, and you don't have to like someone if you don't want to."

Hate crime legislation is designed to legislate thought. That's the underlying fact; it's nothing more than the government deciding what you should be allowed to think.

Laws are meant to govern actions, not thought. We have laws that say it is wrong to kill someone because the taking of a life is an action. We have laws that say it is wrong to attack others because battery is a physical action.

Hate crime legislation punishes people because of why they did something, not because of what they did, and that is a line the government should not cross.

Furthermore, hate crime legislation can be used in almost any instance where criminal and victim are of different backgrounds, whether warranted or not. The abuse of this legislation is far more likely to divide communities, not unite them.

I'm not saying crimes against people committed because of physical traits or lifestyle choices should go unpunished. Crimes should be punished for what actions were taken, that murders are murders, assaults are assaults, and should be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law. It's not the thought that is illegal - it is the physical action.

What can the government do to stop racism, homophobia and other such social ills?

We can advocate diversity, tolerance and education. We can teach our children to respect one another for inner character and to ignore outward traits.

We can teach our children assault, murder and the like are wrong, no matter who the victim is.

I support punishing people for using discriminatory slurs against others, because insulting someone is an action, and action, not thought, should be the criterion we consider when deciding whether government involvement is an option.

I don't even have a problem with individual judges deciding to give out the maximum sentences for anything that could be considered a hate crime. I just have a problem with the written law getting into governing thought.

When the government sets in stone what we aren't allowed to think, I have to disagree. I hate the way members of the Klan or the followers of Fred Phelps think, but I can't support forcing them to think otherwise.

That's the beauty of America; we can show people they are wrong, rather than forcing them to conform.

Simply put, it's one thing for the government to promote a certain way of thinking, it's another for it to add "or else" on top of it.

Peace comes from learning to reject propaganda

Editor,

Can you imagine a K-State vs. Nebraska football game being played with no referees? Can you imagine no rules on the playing field?

A K-State vs. Nebraska football game with no referees would have no winning team; both teams and spectators would be losers. Why do we have rules on our football field and none in our current national politics? We need rules of engagement as we fight for political turf among ourselves.

In the name of peace among us, we could begin by learning about the poisons of politics: propaganda. Perhaps we can learn together about the techniques that are dividing us (taken from www.propaganda101.com).

Owing to the infantile limitations of collective memory, a message must be continuously propagated in order to take hold within the collective consciousness.

The message must be designed in such a way that it appeals to or is quickly understood by the lowest common intellectual denominator of the collective. This is not only true because of the vast ignorance of the masses, but also because the collective attention span is virtually nonexistent. We now live in a world of sound-bite discourse. The simple lie always conquers the complex truth.

The exclusion of detail allows for the quicker processing of the message, while the underlying sentiment reinforces it. The message need not be logically or factually based; this only clouds the affective force of the message. If any logic or fact is included, it must be very simple and plain, requiring virtually no processing time. The use of clichés and platitudes is quite effective.

The next time you hear an argument, look for these misleading statements.

Do not tolerate these from others and do not use these yourself. With a little anti-propaganda practice we can disagree with each other without making war on ourselves.

Christian groups embrace students of all faiths

Editor:

Sarah Lawver, in the letter entitled "Christian groups on campus must welcome all students" doesn't seem to be saying that Christian groups don't welcome others; she simply feels left out because she has a different faith. Well, there seems to be a simple problem to this solution. Start an organization for those who practice "non-Abrahamic religions."

One cannot fault the Christian groups for having too many people. Yes, they have their beliefs, and their mission is to share their faith with others. They want people to come to Jesus not to get some spiritual points or whatever one may believe, but to simply share the free transforming gift of Christ.

You don't have to hide your faith. I, being a Christian, would never ridicule someone for having a different faith. Hopefully we all can disagree and challenge each other without contempt.

From what I've seen, Christian groups do try to provide a loving and welcoming atmosphere. Just try one of the campus ministries sometime.

Come with me if you want. I'm not perfect, but I try to love people because they are human. Not on the basis of religion, race or preferences. I believe Christ loves me and He commands Christians to love others. Yes, we fall short, but I hope you, Sarah, would be open to coming to a Christian event even if it is just to hang out.

Storm protection varies by structures' designs

THE ORACLE (U. SOUTH FLORIDA)

TAMPA, Fla. - The U.S. government was quick to give access to national funds to rebuild infrastructure and private homes that were damaged by Hurricane Charley. However, there are several other steps that should be taken to reduce the damage future storms may cause.

Mobile homes and other light-build structures bore the brunt of the storm's damages. Because Florida's climate is generally mild, homes in Florida are, for the most part, not as sturdy as the buildings farther north that have to withstand harsh winters. Floridians take a gamble of a hurricane hitting their area when they don't reinforce the structures of their homes.

Regardless, the federal and local governments should be commended for acting swiftly to bring monetary relief to those who need it.

Willingham's decision to quit team hurts players

Things were looking up for the K-State men's basketball program until this week.

The Wildcats finished a .500 last season and their highly-touted recruiting class from 2003 had a year under their belts. Then on Monday, Coach Jim Wooldridge announced one of those highly-touted recruits, Dez Willingham, was not returning to the team.

The decision left many, including myself, wondering what happened.

Why would you leave a team when you are the starting point guard?

Why would you leave an up-and-coming team?

Why would you do that to your teammates?

In his teleconference Monday afternoon, Wooldridge said Willingham's yearning to be close to home outweighed his commitment to K-State.

I don't have a problem with him wanting to be closer to home and his family, but to make that decision two days before school and practice started?

Now Wooldridge has to scramble to fill the point guard position — a position he thought he had locked for the next three years — with unproven and inexperienced players.

Willingham's timing was selfish, and the way he let his coach know about his decision was disrespectful.

What I really don't understand about Willingham's departure is he was in Manhattan for most of the spring and summer working on overcoming his shoulder injury, getting ready for the season. He gave Wooldridge no indication he was not coming back for his sophomore season.

"I felt we had a good relationship with Dez," Wooldridge said. "When we got word that he was thinking about not coming back, we were shocked."

K-State Recreational Services' sponsorship of club sports provides ties to university

By Stacy Ryan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With the goal of better efficiency and stronger organization, K-State Recreational Services took over club sports teams this summer.

The idea has been in the works for the past several years, but everything came together over the summer, as Tim Stoecklein was named coordinator of the sport clubs program on July 1.

Before the move, each club sport on campus was independent and only loosely tied to the university, lacking a central administrative organization.

Stoecklein said he is excited with the direction the transition is going.

"It is definitely a positive change. We are already seeing a more centralized source of communication and resources," Stoecklein said. "Before it was more scattered, but now it is easier for the teams to communicate within themselves."

Stoecklein said he wants to make himself available as much as possible to help benefit the students.

"I am here to answer questions and help with the logistics. We are helping with transportation and donations and already seeing big profits," he said.

Raydon Robel, Rec Services director, said the change will offer various benefits to the teams.

"It's really a great benefit to the clubs. They will get better coverage of their area, more facilities, better advertisement, retention and help in recruiting to K-State," he said. "A greater deal of interest and emphasis will be placed on them, which will aid in recruitment."

Hayes sets record, takes gold

Joanna Hayes screamed as she crossed the finish line of the 100-meter hurdles in Olympic-record time. About 90 meters behind her, world champion Perdita Felicien lay flat on the ground, crying in disbelief.

Joanna Hayes won the hurdles in an Olympic-record 12.37 seconds.

Felicien got off to a bad start and stepped on the first hurdle, tumbling to the ground and taking Irina Shevchenko of Russia with her. All Felicien could do was watch Hayes win in 12.37 seconds, breaking the Olympic record of 12.38 set by Bulgaria's Yordanka Donkova 16 years ago.

Iraq falls, to play for bronze

The Iraqi soccer team's improbable run at an Olympic gold medal ended Tuesday night with a 3-1 semifinal loss to Paraguay. The Iraqis still have a chance for a bronze, which would be their war-weary nation's first medal in 44 years.

Paraguay made history of its own, getting two goals from Jose Cardozo and one from Fredy Bareiro to advance to Saturday's gold-medal game against Argentina, a 3-0 winner over Italy. Gold or silver, it will be the first Olympic medal of any sort for Paraguay.

Iraq and Italy will play for the bronze Friday night.

Volleyball pair wins gold

Misty May and Kerri Walsh made it look easy, even in the end.

The top-ranked American beach volleyball pair defeated second-seeded Brazilians Shelda Bede and Adriana Behar 21-17, 21-11 on Tuesday night, capping the most dominant run in the sport's history with a gold medal.

May and Walsh didn't drop a set in Athens, with the 6-foot-3 Walsh dominating at the net and the quick May scrambling and diving for every dig.

Runner adapts to K-State cross country despite culture shock

By Anthony Mendoza
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's 6 a.m., the lights are off, and your face is buried into your pillow for a few more hours.

Mathew Chesang is awake though, and he is taking his 10-mile daily run, all while you're still deep into a slumber or hitting the snooze button before a morning class.

This is part of Chesang's daily grind — a workout session at a 5:40 per-mile pace that has produced two All-Big 12 cross country honors.

Now Chesang is working towards number three.

"When he was a freshman, he was shell shocked," cross country coach Randy Smith said.

"He was coming from a very different culture and lifestyle in Kenya, and his first year he trained hard, and he did what we asked him to do, but I don't think he adjusted completely. His sophomore year he made the adjustment and last year he made some breakthroughs," Smith said.

Last season, Chesang was K-State's top finisher in every meet, including two first-place finishes in the Hurricane Festival and Wildcat Invitational. Chesang also finished fifth in the Big Championships, giving him all-conference honors by finishing in the top fifteen.

Chesang said he made the nearly 8,500-mile journey to the United States four years ago not knowing what to expect.

He had heard stories about "the ugly

Americans" and didn't anticipate getting any help in this new culture.

"When I came to America I thought people were going to mind their own business and not pay attention," Chesang said.

"But people here are very helpful. I didn't think I was going to find anything like that here."

His parents also were not supportive of the move across the Atlantic Ocean until the man who helped recruit him — former K-State distance runner and fellow Kenyan Shadrack Kimeli — stepped up and helped him adjust to the environment and ease his parents' worries.

While Chesang said he adapted to the culture quickly with the help of Kimeli, he was having trouble adjusting to the Kansas low altitude and climate.

"My freshman year was the hardest because I had to adjust climate-wise," Chesang said.

"I come from the high altitude, and I came to the low altitude, and breathing was hard because the place was humid, not like back at home."

Another adjustment Chesang had to make was to the cold winters.

In Kenya, the temperature rarely reaches below 55 degrees, and he had never experienced snow or a cold winter until he came to the United States.

"I hate snow. Snow is the worst thing because it's cold and hard to train outside," he said.

"At first I was trying to train indoors, but after a while I got used to it. Now, I can go out in the winter and run as long as there's not too much snow."

Anthropologist captures reservation life in photos

Rudy Garza of Junction City admires an art exhibit by Sarah Wiles last week displayed at the Manhattan Art Center. The Plains Indian Museum of Cody, Wyo., developed the exhibit in cooperation with the artist.

For Sara Wiles, photography and anthropology go hand in hand.

Wiles is the featured artist of the current exhibit at the Manhattan Arts Center, the exhibit's title is "Ni'ihii: In a Good Way," which is the English translation for the Arapaho word.

The exhibit consists of photographs of Wind River Arapaho in Wyoming, from 1976-1996, and will be on display until Sept. 11.

Wiles has undergraduate and graduate degrees in anthropology and said she began taking photographs in graduate school.

"I actually did quite a few black and white rolls and was hooked on the magic of photography," she said.

The "Ni'ihii" exhibit includes 44 photographs. Even in 1996 she had a tremendous collection, but she said now she has about 20,000 negatives.

"The curator from the Buffalo Bill Historical Center in Cody, Wyoming and I selected images we thought were nice, engaging and showed the positive side of reservation life," she said.

Sara Wiles' brother-in-law, Larry Davis, is a biochemistry professor, and when Wiles' exhibit first went on the road in 1998 she told him about it, and he worked with the arts center.

Accompanying Wiles' photography is the artwork of Barry Coffin, a Lawrence artist of Potawatomi and Creek descent.

"It's a good combination of work," Coffin said. "Both have Indian themes and both help education in Indian ways."

His work is comprised of paintings, most of which are space landscapes, and ceramic sculptures of what he calls "space plants"—what he thinks plants in space might look like.

Both are made using acrylic paint, giving the art a bright appearance.

"They're just images that have come to me," Coffin said.

"Years ago I used to glaze them and sometimes the piece would get messed up, and I'd have to paint the piece to correct it," Coffin said. "I use acrylic paint because it doesn't have toxins like oil paint does, so it's healthier."

Susan Oviatt, gallery committee chair, said the exhibit is sponsored by Davis and also comes from a grant from the Native American Parent's Committee of Manhattan-Ogden USD 383.

Even though the school year just began and the "Ni'ihii" exhibit will only be in the arts center until Sept. 11, Oviatt said it is important for children to see the show.

The arts center sent 60 packets to local teachers with information about the show, including a list of materials to be checked out, like language books and a copy of Bambi dubbed in the Arapaho language.

Midnight Madness showcases actors' talents with skits

It's as if "Saturday Night Live" was on HBO.

That's how George Stavropoulos, junior in theater, described Midnight Madness, which begins at 11:30 Thursday night.

"It started off as something to promote playwrighting. What it blossomed into was raw, uncensored sketch comedy," said Stavropoulos, who hosts the event.

He said hosting is an adrenaline rush that can't be recaptured.

"I love doing live theater...you have to be on your A game when you're improvising," he said. "When you're an actor in a play you have your script to fall back on, your fellow actors to fall back on.

"But here, you're naked out there, and just like the audience you don't know what's going to happen."

Stavropoulos' co-host, Kelly Wood, junior in theater, said the first-time aspect makes Madness special.

"It's the same for anyone watching it. It's going to be the first time anybody's seen it and maybe the last time anybody's going to see it. It's the first time anybody's going to read your script," Wood said.

"No other place are you going to experience something like this."

The show takes place on the third Thursday of each month, and an accompanying theme is announced Monday of the same week, which is done to keep it fresh.

"We want to know this was written in the past few hours," Stavropoulos said. "It's not supposed to be a great work of art."

"It's just a way to get something off your chest."

Midnight Madness started more than five years ago as a playwrighting exercise. Stavropoulos said because Madness was started several years ago most people who helped with it's creation have graduated, and that is why participation from new people is important.

This week's theme is, "In the Beginning..."

Superior Court Judge Rodney Melville said Monday he was inclined to admit 39 pieces of evidence and is "concerned" about at least a dozen other items that the may order suppressed.

The items were referred to in court by numbers only and it was impossible to decipher what most of them were. Minimal search warrant data previously released indicated the evidence tentatively admitted included several computer hard drives and a cassette recorder and audio tape found in a safe in Jackson's bathroom. A witness said the tape contained a child's voice.

The numbers used for items the judge expressed concern about indicated they included documents potentially covered by attorney-client privilege. The judge said he was inclined to suppress items he did not list and no hints were given as to what they contained.

Internships help prepare students for job market

By Nathan Ryerson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

College is a time to prepare for the working world.

Internships are a great way to get real world working experience while having your feet planted in college, said Jennifer Brantley, assistant director at Career and Employment Services at K-State.

"Eighty percent of companies offer internships," Brantley said.

She said her office is flexible enough to deal with individual student needs.

"We have people assigned to each college that are familiar with their programs and know employers that offer internships in their area, locally and nationally," Brantley said.

She said students should not wait until late in their college careers to start thinking about internships.

"We recommend doing internships as early as possible to make sure that it's what you want to do," Brantley said.

Gloria Freeland, director of Huck Boyd National Center for Community Media, said that it's good for students to gain experience.

"You can learn experience and gain skills, such as dependability," Freeland said.

Stephanie Melcher, graduate student in accounting, said she learned what employers really expect from a person in the real world.

"I learned how to communicate with supervisors," she said. "I also learned how to work well with other employees."

She said internships also can be helpful in directing students to their preferred career.

Melcher said her internship helped her reinforce where she thought she wanted to go with her internship.

"Going into my internship I wasn't sure exactly where I wanted to go," she said. "I now know what I want to do."

A number of companies that offer internships may offer you a job after they see how you act and handle yourself in a job-oriented situation, she said.

Fifty percent of employers offer interns a job at the end of their internship, Brantley said.

Fair brings job, activity opportunities

By Echo Prather

Students looking for volunteer positions will be able to find them tomorrow at the Part-Time Opportunities Fair.

Jennifer Brantley, assistant director at Career and Employment Services, said CES established the job expo and volunteer fair.

"We decided last year to combine it," Brantley said. "It's a one-stop shop of opportunities from local organizations."

She said the new combined fair will give students and employers a chance to network with each other.

There will be 29 volunteer organizations present, Brantley said, including Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan, Inc. at the fair.

Roy Crenshaw, executive director of the Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan, Inc., said the organization plans to have a booth at the fair and will disperse information to students on how they can become matched with an at-risk student in the community.

Not only are community organizations going to the Opportunity Fair, but so are campus organizations, including the Gear Up program.

"The Gear Up programs are having booths at the job fair as a means of recruiting tutors," said Winsome Morgan-Bartley, Gear Up program director.

Students should be sure to bring their Wildcat Card for registration and possibly copies of their resumes.

Interview dress an important part of creating quality first impressions

By Addie Laue
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Preparing for an interview can be a stressful process, and often overlooked when creating a resume and preparing for interview questions is the importance of dressing appropriately for the position.

"The way you are dressed conveys a message just like a resume does," said Marcia Schuley, associate director at Career and Employment Services.

Nancy Hammerschmidt, career agent at Farm Bureau, said she agrees.

"The way an applicant dresses is a big factor in an interview; it speaks to their professionalism," she said.

But dressing appropriately for an interview doesn't have to mean a double-breasted suit.

"Acceptable dress depends on the position being applied for," said Terry Umsheid, workforce development representative at the Manhattan Workforce Center.

Schuley said she recommended considering what your dress on the job would be when deciding how to dress for the interview.

"For example, if you are interviewing for a horticultural services position, and your work attire will be jeans and a t-shirt, business casual wear is appropriate for the interview," Schuley said. "On the other hand, if you are applying for a corporate position, a business suit would be most appropriate."

Dressing well need not be expensive, either.

"Career and Employment Services put on a fashion show and dressing for interview workshop last spring. There were really great clothes from Target," Schuley said.

Schuley also warns of other dress and grooming downfalls. She said it is best to avoid excessive jewelry and even fragrances that could be overwhelming.

It is also critical not to show too much skin, she said. As for grooming, Schuley suggested looking to professionals in the field you're applying to for guidance.

"Look at their grooming and haircuts," she said. "You don't want to go to an interview after graduation still looking like a college student."

Career and Employment Services provides internship, employment information

By Annette Lawless
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Looking for a part-time job to pay off semester debt?

Or are you seeking a hands-on experience through an internship?

Whether you are a freshman or a graduate student, Career and Employment Services is offering their services to students on campus.

"We have different aspects of services," said Jennifer Brantley, CES assistant director. "This fair will gather approximately 50 businesses from the Manhattan community."

"Businesses are seeking all types of students and are providing all sorts of jobs, from internships to volunteer work to part-time jobs," Brantley said. "Attending the Opportunity Fair is an easy way to find those connections."

Roy Crenshaw, executive director for Big Brothers, Big Sisters of Manhattan, Inc., said the fair is an event he looks forward to every year.

"We have a small staff, and with a university as large as K-State, students are always a valuable outlet for us," Crenshaw said.

"The fair allows us to have that central location for us to meet up with students interested in a job."

"It is very important for students to go attend the Opportunity Fair and other services offered on campus," said Michelle Haupt, Coordinator of the Academic and Career Information Center.

She said internships, volunteering and other experiences can be very helpful in the future.

"Many students do not know what they should major in at K-State," Haupt said. "Students need hands-on experience. Internships and volunteer work will allow you to have that experience and define whether you want to seek that career."

"The sooner students learn whether they like or dislike their career options, the better," Haupt said. "At least they will know what not to do as a career."

However, if students cannot make it to the fair, Brantley said there still are other options for students.

"Students are encouraged to drop by our office," Brantley said. "We have a friendly staff that can help you with building your resume or looking for the perfect job."

Brantley said the CES Web site also is available for students.

"Some businesses post a job opening one day and have over 30 applications the next," she said. "Our site has had over 107,000 hits, and it seems to be a popular way to find jobs."

K-State 12th best school for athletes

School ranked No. 5 as bargain

By Annie M. Lewis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Locals have long considered K-State to be a quality school, but recently even Ivy Leaguers are expressing that sentiment.

The university was listed as the No. 5 best bargain school and No. 12 best jock school in the 2005 Princeton Review's "Best 357 Colleges."

The nationally recognized Princeton Review surveys more than 2,000 colleges every year to compile the lists for the annual publication available to anyone seeking a college.

Dean of Student Life Pat Bosco said he is proud of K-State's reputation for success in sports.

"It does not surprise me that K-State was recognized for its intramural and intercollegiate sports," Bosco said. "Everybody wears purple. We have an excellent women's volleyball team, women's basketball team and football team."

The term "jock school" also takes into account the pride of the Greek system on the campus and the theater department.

"We have nationally ranked fraternities and sororities," Bosco said. "They are known for their leadership and programming. We have it all. K-State is a happy place to be."

Vice President of Institutional Advancement Bob Krause said he was not at all surprised to see K-State ranked fifth in terms of best bargain.

"It reinforces what we all thought for so long," he said. "The quality of education students receive here allows them to compete with any other school in the job market."

Krause said the resources available to students for such a low price is the real bargain.

"We've always been about being a place for students to bring their dreams," Krause said. "We give them the tools they need to achieve their dreams."

Student Body President Hayley Urkevich said she agreed.

"I don't think we realize what we could be paying," Urkevich said. "The quality of education here is superb for the amount we pay."

Senior officials blamed for Iraqi prison abuse

By Robert Burns
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — U.S. soldiers running the Abu Ghraib prison are mainly to blame for the inmate abuses there, but fault also lies with the Pentagon's most senior civilian and military officials, according to a report released Tuesday by an independent panel of civilian defense experts.

Senior leaders did not establish clear guidelines on permissible techniques for interrogating various categories of prisoners held at Abu Ghraib and elsewhere in Iraq, the report said.

High-level commanders failed to shift resources to an understaffed and ill-trained prison detention unit once it became apparent that the system was out of control, the report said.

The findings were presented at a Pentagon news conference by James Schlesinger, the former secretary of defense who headed a four-person commission created last May by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

"There was chaos at Abu Ghraib," Schlesinger said, and it was due in part to the fact that the prison was a regular target of shelling by an Iraqi insurgency not adequately anticipated by U.S. leaders.

The report said the direct responsibility lay with soldiers and commanders in the field rather than in Washington.

"There was direct responsibility for those activities on the part of the commanders on the scene up to the brigade level, because they did not adequately supervise what was going on at Abu Ghraib," Schlesinger said. "There was indirect responsibility at higher levels, in that the weaknesses at Abu Ghraib were well-known and that corrective action could have been taken and should have been taken."

big, and with only about 150 in the theater, the hosts said they want to make sure it's clear people should show up early. It starts at 11:30 p.m., but Stavropoulos recommended arriving at 11.

Stavropoulos said Madness usually lasts until all the scripts are gone, but promised it would be done before last call at the bars.

Midnight Madness regular Keenan Ramos, senior in theater, said a highlight for him was a performance four years ago by Jake Worcester, who at the time was student body president. It was during Ramos' first Madness.

"He never did any kind of theater, but it was one of the funniest performances that I've ever seen," Ramos said. "He got up there and was so damn hilarious I thought he was a performer, but he had nothing to do with theater and I always

Because it's the first show of the new year, Stavropoulos said he has surprises for Thursday that Wood doesn't even know

"We have enough Native Americans (in the school district) to qualify for that grant, but we don't have any art," Oviatt said.

"We need it here so the public can benefit by learning more about Native Americans."

Oviatt said the photographs did a service by showing a side of Native American life that is healthy.

"Often what we see are the difficulties," she said.

"This is different; it helps break down stereotypes."

Oviatt said when the exhibit first opened, someone at the reception made a derogatory comment about Native Americans. She told that person if they looked at the pictures, it would be apparent from the family interaction in the photos they are just like anyone else.

More than half of the photos are portraits of tribe elders. Wiles said that is because when she first moved to the area it was for a job with the area senior center.

"Arapaho elders are highly respected, and people would always ask me, 'please take photos of our elders,'" she said.

"Plus I knew if I did a good job with the elders, I'd get better access."

She said her work is important because few people spend as much time documenting Native American life as Wiles has.

"Most are what I'd call 'hit and run,' which means they're just in and out, or are looking for the dirty underside of reservation life," she said.

"They're really limited, because they don't know what they're seeing."

"I could point things out in photographs no one else, not from the reservation, would know."

Wiles said the exhibit has been to more than 20 galleries or museums in seven or eight states.

"I get to travel, see new places and meet new people," Wiles said.

One man's junk is another man's treasure.

Women’s basketball schedule announced for 2004-05

Staff reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Thirteen teams which advanced to the NCAA or Women’s NIT postseason play highlight the K-State women’s basketball 2004-05 schedule.

Head coach Deb Patterson said in a press release Tuesday the non-conference slate of games should test the Wildcats early.

“Our 2004-05 preseason schedule is extremely challenging,” she said. “Villanova, Alabama and St. Joseph’s on the road, as well as our potential matchup with Stephen F. Austin or Duke in the Bahamas will highlight a great non-conference road slate.”

For the second-straight season, K-State will play in the eight-team, Junkanoo Jam tournament in Grand Bahama Island over the Thanksgiving holiday. The Wildcats could battle NCAA Elite Eight participant Duke on day two of the tournament.

Host of the 10th annual Commerce Bank Wildcat Classic on Dec. 3-4, K-State will play New Hampshire in the first round and the winner of Tennessee State/Liberty in the championship game.

Then, the Wildcats face off against Villanova on Dec. 28 and St. Joseph’s on Dec. 30 in Philadelphia.

On the Big 12 schedule, K-state will host Missouri, Nebraska, Texas A&M, Iowa State, Oklahoma State, Texas, Colorado and Kansas, as the Wildcats try to extend their 17-game home winning streak.

COLUMN | Loss of player unfair to basketball team

Willingham, at the very least, owed it to his coach and teammates to let them know sooner, or even that he was having feelings of leaving the team.

Although Willingham may not be retiring from basketball, his decision to leave K-State is reminiscent of Ricky Williams’ recent retirement from the Dolphins a week before training camp and Barry Sanders’ shocking retirement one day before the Detroit Lions opened training camp in 1999.

In all three instances, regardless of how great they were as players, Willingham, Williams and Sanders disrespected the people that were just as close as family to them.

K-State gave a true freshman a chance and made an investment in the future, and it backfired.

Now the team and coaches have to deal with the consequences.

Wooldridge and the rest of the Wildcat basketball team have every right to be frustrated, disappointed and even angry, but they must move on.

Wooldridge summed it up nicely.

“Sometimes young people make decisions that make us older people just scratch our heads,” he said.

CLUB SPORTS | Rec Services assumes control

club team, said the change will help lighten the load on the teams.

“They are taking over a lot of the little things which will get a burden off of our shoulders,” he said.

The whole idea of Rec Services assuming control of this position was proposed by the Student Governing Association.

“It was initiated last year, because they were looking for an administrative home for the sport clubs. Traditionally, this type of activity falls under Rec Services,” Robel said.

Hayley Urkevich, student body president, agreed it was something they have been wanting to put into effect.

“Student Activities and Services have been wanting to do this for quite a few years. In the past it was shot down, but this year we allocated money for a coordinator,” she said.

Stoecklein emphasized the importance of communication and working together.

“We are trying to provide them with resources to cut down on costs and improve efficiency. Before, each club did their own thing, and now they can get together and share ideas about what works and what doesn’t,” he said.

This year will be a transition year, but many view the change as a step in the right direction.

“This year there will be some transition from the financial aspect, but we will be the home base. We handle administrative supervision, paperwork, part of the Web page, monitoring practice at the stadium and use of Ahearn, Memorial Stadium and the Rec,” Robel said.

There will be specific times and places set aside for the teams to practice which will help with organization.

“There are scheduled club times for practicing at Memorial Stadium. Every Monday to Thursday from 6:30 to 11 p.m., the field is set aside for sport club practice and activities with people there to monitor the field,” Stoecklein said.

Robel said the focus is getting everything running smoothly.

“It will take a good year to get everything to work the best for the kids,” he said.

New aluminum bottles keep beer colder, longer

By Charles Sheehan
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PITTSBURGH — How much would you pay for a bottle of beer that stays cold nearly an hour longer?

Pittsburgh Brewing Co., maker of Iron City Beer, is asking an additional $1 per case.

The brewery has partnered with Alcoa Inc., the world's largest aluminum maker, to produce aluminum bottles that keep beer colder for as much as 50 minutes longer than a glass bottle, Alcoa officials said.

About 20,000 cases of the new aluminum bottle beer are en route to as many as 28 states and should be on shelves this week, Alcoa and Pittsburgh Brewing said Tuesday.

The bottles have three times the aluminum of a typical beer can. That gives them superior insulation, Alcoa spokesman Kevin Lowery said.

It's not the first time Alcoa has teamed up with the local brewery to put out a new product. In 1962, the two put the first pull-tab beer cans on shelves.

Iron City wants to expand sales. But the aluminum bottle may be more important to Alcoa. The aluminum giant wants to win back a share of the market it lost to beer bottles — both glass and plastic, which are now common at sporting events nationwide.

About 40 percent of all beer consumed comes out of cans, 43 percent from bottles and 8 percent from the tap, according to the Beer Institute, which tracks industry trends. Bottles, however, have gained ground over the past decade.

Plastic bottles make up only 0.5 percent of all beer sales, according to the Beer Institute. But having aluminum bottles at sporting events would introduce the product to thousands who might buy a case for home.

Some people say they can taste the difference between beer in cans and bottles.

Lew Bryson, an author of two books on breweries, said those complaints are psychological, since the aluminum is coated.

But, Bryson said, there may be a lingering taste when the seal of an aluminum can is broken.

The aluminum bottle could eliminate that, he said.

One microbrewery based in Missoula, Mont., has been using aluminum bottles. Heineken released a limited edition aluminum bottle last year.

Aluminum bottles also have proven successful for a few breweries in Japan, but Iron City is the first company in North America to ship the bottles nationally, company officials said.

RENOVATIONS | Playing surfaces improved

Associate athletic director for development Sheahon Zenger said the fund raising process is a year-round undertaking.

"We are constantly on the look-out for major gifts from donors," Zenger said.

Scott said the need for the football complex improvements came from the need for space, not trying to keep up with other universities.

"We are well aware of what other people have, but it's not a case of keeping up with the Jones," Scott said. "Our weight-room, equipment room and sports medicine facility are extremely small, and we just outgrew our area."

Zenger said he agreed K-State is not behind other universities.

"At K-State we have all of our major facilities in place," Zenger said.

The construction of the locker room and office complex at the R.V. Christian Track will break ground in September and cost $600,000.

"The final design is in, and it should be completed in May in time for the Big 12 Conference Track and Field outdoor championships," Scott said.

The tennis courts, used by both students and varsity athletes, will begin their $140,000 face lift next week.

"The old surface was beginning to crack," Scott said. "They are going to take it back down to the concrete and build the new surface from there. The project should take about a month to complete."

Although the list of projects in the works seems long, Zenger said the Vanier Football Complex, the track locker room and offices and the rowing team's boathouse are the focus.

"Those three projects have legs and we are heavily into those right now," Zenger said. "We are not putting all of our energy towards just one thing. We are constantly reviewing the list of projects."

SEVERAL PROJECTS COMPLETED

The most notable and visual facility improvements to be completed came over the summer with Bramlage Coliseum and Ahearn Field House receiving new playing surfaces for basketball and volleyball, respectively.

Scott said the renovated court in Bramlage came as a result of negotiations between Robbins Flooring of Cincinnati, Ohio, which installed the previous floor, and the athletic department.

"The finish and the paint was peeling off of the old floor," Scott said. "The floor was replaced at no cost."

The floor in Bramlage will feature a larger Powercat logo, purple free-throw lanes, the new Big 12 logo at the top of each lane and the word, "Wildcats," painted in purple underneath both baskets.

Women's basketball coach Deb Patterson said she is excited about the new floor in Bramlage.

"It makes a sharp and impressive statement about K-State," Patterson said. "We have really noticed the difference in quality."

Capt. Gary Grubs of the Riley County Police Department said the lab was not unique in its size, and he was unsure of where the methamphetamines were being distributed.

The residence and garage at 309 Barton Rd. in Leonardville contained equipment and chemicals for the manufacture of methamphetamine, and paraphernalia used to distribute and consume methamphetamine and marijuana, Grubs said.

Also found were numerous stolen street signs from Riley County and the state of Kansas, according to an RCPD press release.

The search warrant was executed by the RCPD and the Kansas Bureau of Investigation.

Bush campaign lawyer, veterans group adviser resigns

By Sharon Theimer
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON— An election lawyer for President Bush who has been advising a veterans group running TV ads against Democrat John Kerry resigned Wednesday from Bush's campaign.

"I cannot begin to express my sadness that my legal representations have become a distraction from the critical issues at hand in this election," Benjamin Ginsberg wrote in a resignation letter to Bush released by the campaign.

"I feel I cannot let that continue, so I have decided to resign as national counsel to your campaign to ensure that the giving of legal advice to decorated military veterans, which was entirely within the boundaries of the law, doesn't distract from the real issues upon which you and the country should be focusing."

Ginsberg's acknowledgment

Tuesday evening that he was providing legal advice to the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth marked the second time in days that a person associated with the Bush-Cheney campaign had been connected to the group, which Kerry accuses of being a front for the Republican incumbent's re-election effort.

The Bush campaign and the veterans' group have said repeatedly there is no coordination.

Bush campaign chairman Marc Racicot released a statement calling Ginsberg a "friend, public servant and statesman" and saying, "For the past five years, he provided the president with first-rate campaign legal advice."

Lawyers on the Democratic side are also representing both the campaign or party and outside groups running ads in the presidential race. Ginsberg's dual role has drawn attention

Fraternity members await finish of renovations

By Leann Sulzen

Maid service and an indoor swimming pool can't compare to living at home.

That's what Alpha Gamma Rho President Craig Doane said about living in the Holiday Inn during the spring semester.

Members of the fraternity had to move into the hotel last spring during house renovations.

"It was a great opportunity, but I was relieved to get back here," he said.

Doane said the house was available for occupancy a couple of days before school started, but some construction remains unfinished.

"Right now they are mostly working on our outside area which is going to be a large roofed porch area," he said.

The renovations that are expected to be complete by Sept. 10, cost about $1 million and were mostly funded by alumni donations, Doane said.

"Members make a pledge to give a donation after we graduate," he said. "The average donation is about $500 a person."

AGR isn't the only fraternity undergoing renovations.

Sigma Phi Epsilon's renovations, which began in June, should be finished next August.

Members are currently living elsewhere, Sig Ep President Brian Coleman said.

"All active members are living across the city in group housing of seven or eight," Coleman said. "Most of our new members are living in Moore Hall in three to four room clusters."

Coleman described the stress of having members living in different areas.

"Communication is a lot harder than it used to be," he said. "We are utilizing the Internet right now. It's been a challenge, but it's nothing we can't handle."

Even though there is no house, recruitment hasn't suffered, Coleman said.

"Truthfully, we had a really great rush year and we signed 26 guys," he said. "I don't really know that not having a chapter facility had anything to do with that."

AGR, however, did suffer, Doane said.

"It was hard to get recruits

Difficulties increase for on-campus parking

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Cars were illegally parked and adorned with yellow ticket envelopes on campus Wednesday.

Jeff Barnes, assistant director of Parking Services, said Wednesday was the first day of classes where the parking situation had gotten out of hand.

"This was the first day we were out and citing people on campus, and it marked the first day of major problems with parking," Barnes said.

Barnes said Parking Services has been issuing warnings to automobiles since Friday except for the metered spaces and any safety violations, that have received parking tickets.

He said officials had been busy issuing parking permits for the first two days of classes and wanted to get organized before ticketing students.

Parking Services has issued warnings to students for the first few days of classes for several years, Barnes said.

"We want to make a good impression and let students get to know their campus," Barnes said.

Barnes said officials from Parking Services have talked to students who are parked in incorrect lots. He said parking officials like to find people who are parked illegally in the center of campus and work their way out.

"When we talk to the students, we force them out of the spots so that the people with permits can park there," Barnes said.

K-State Police Officer James Williamson said there were no accidents Wednesday related to the parking situation.

"There's always been accidents on campus; we didn't have any more than usual today," Williamson said.

Barnes said he does not understand why there has been a rush of students to campus.

"It didn't seem any different from any other year until today, it seemed like everyone was driving to campus," Barnes said.

Russian officials investigate possible terrorism link in plane crashes

By Mike Eckel
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BUCHALKI, Russia — Russian investigators labored Wednesday to determine whether terrorism caused the near-simultaneous crashes of two jetliners, killing all 89 people aboard and spreading anxieties about a possible bloody escalation of the Chechen conflict.

Officials stressed that no evidence of a terrorist attack had yet been found among charred wreckage and said they opened a criminal investigation as they looked into other causes like bad fuel, equipment malfunction and human error. The planes' data recorders were recovered, but experts were only just starting to retrieve information from them.

The planes crashed just days before a Kremlin-called presidential election in Chechnya, whose rebels have staged suicide bombings and other attacks across Russia in recent years, including the 2002 seizure of hundreds of hostages at a Moscow theater.

Witnesses reported hearing three explosions before a Volga-Aviaexpress airline Tu-134 went down in a field near Buchalki, about 125 miles south of Moscow, with 43 passengers and crew.

The wreckage of a Sibir airlines Tu-154 with 46 people aboard was spread over a few hundred yards in a rugged field near Glubokiy in the region of Rostov-on-Don, some 600 miles south of Moscow. The Tu-154 jet had activated a signal indicating the plane might have been hijacked or in distress.

Reports of far-flung wreckage suggest an explosion may have preceded a crash, said Jim Burin of the U.S.-based Flight Safety Foundation. He also said bad fuel could cause an airplane's engines to fail, but the crew likely would have reported it well before engines quit.

"I would expect some

Union adjusts temperatures on Food Court salad bar

By Joanna Rubick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The salad bar in the K-State Student Union Food Court recently received a complaint for being too warm.

The Riley County Department of Health performed an inspection on the food Monday, Aug. 16, after receiving complaints that the salad bar food was too warm, which they found to be true, said Joe Kitterman, environmental health supervisor.

Salads should remain at a temperature of 41 degrees or lower, and the salads on the salad bar were in the lower 60s, he said.

"If you don't refrigerate, the food will either spoil, which won't really hurt anybody, or form pathogenic organisms, which could," Kitterman said. "There's no way to know which bacteria will form, so to be safe, we keep the food refrigerated."

Bernard Pitts, executive director of the Union, said there is nothing to worry about.

He said the inspection was done the day the air conditioning was out in the Union, and the refrigerator units also were out that day.

"It was bad timing," he said. "We had some food items that were iced that had to be thrown out."

Pitts said since the incident the temperatures have been where they are supposed to be and are checked every 15 to 20 minutes.

Kitterman said the follow-up inspection happens 10 days after the initial inspection or soon after, so it could happen today.

Ronald Bridges, campus sanitarian, said there are monthly inspections at the Union to make sure they are doing everything that needs to be done.

"Every food service has times they need to be doing something different," he said.

Bridges said the Union makes the necessary changes when asked.

"Some changes are harder to make than others, and some can be made immediately," he said. "In general, they are good about making the changes."

Alumni are inviting all students to the annual Wildcat Welcome Day.

The K-State Alumni Center and Student Alumni Board are again sponsoring the event from 3 to 9 p.m. today at the K-State Alumni Center, said Andrea Bryant, associate director of alumni programs.

"The event offers a great social setting for newcomers to the university," Bryant said. "It gives them an opportunity to have fun and interact with other students and alumni on campus."

Student Alumni Board President Kristy Tredway said the experience is something every new student should encounter.

"It is a pretty relaxed atmosphere, so students can come and go as they please," Tredway said.

"We are happy to have new students on campus and to distribute information to them. If students want to talk about their school year or get the scoop on the Alumni Center, we will be there to provide those details to them."

Tredway said the event provides more than just information about the Alumni Center. They will be giving away free Call Hall ice cream, soda and prizes, including a $250 textbook scholarship.

TO THE POINT SGA members should always remember goals

Student senators and members of the executive branch made many promises to get elected last spring.

It was encouraging to see those promises being fulfilled with hours of research and meetings, while the rest of the student body was enjoying their summer break.

As elected representatives, there is an understanding of a bigger workload and dedication to making things happen.

The students have high expectations, including the institution of a university-wide honor system, diversity initiatives and a student portal Web site.

We also expect responsible, persuasive communication with the administration and a fair allocation of our privilege fees.

It's up to the students to hold their leaders accountable, and we expect a continuation of the dedication we have seen so far.

We urge student leaders to remember the promises they made to their constituents and to remain true to those promises.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Campus Edge project harms student housing

The city and several business owners have a great plan.

The Aggieville Campus Edge project is designed in a way that everyone involved is likely to walk away happier and much, much richer. Except the students.

The proposal targets an L-shaped area that runs four blocks along North Manhattan Avenue and one block east on Bluemont Avenue.

The project likely will benefit the businesses and property owners near the area. The landscape will be more inviting, bringing more customers to the area. Property owners will have the option of selling their land and having the current structures razed to make way for more large-scale apartment complexes.

And students will be faced with more distant, big-company landlords whose only allegiance is to bringing in more profit, which they can use to invade another college town.

Included in the proposal are five square blocks of high-density housing and retail businesses, as well as three parking garages.

While the goals of the project are superficially commendable, officials need to consider the long-term and adverse effects the plan could have on students.

I've lived in three locally owned apartments in my four years in Manhattan, as well as a summer in a large complex. There is no comparison.

Sure, the pool, fitness room, alarm system and laundry facility were nice, but I'd trade it all for $50 cheaper rent and a landlord I know will take care of me.

FRIDAY'S OPINIONS

ABBY HILES

Abby Hiles discusses the use of post-graduate standardized testing.

Leta Reppert explains why a candidate's war record is irrelevant to the current elections.

LETA REPPERT

America's withdrawal from Germany long overdue

Although we liberated their country from a brutal dictator, America finally has realized that we are not welcome there and resolved to withdraw our troops.

After all, when nation-building has so obviously failed, why should we keep our troops in Germany? Sauerkraut is good, but should it be foreign policy?

Let's hope that's a false dichotomy. Surely we can enjoy a fine pickled cabbage and a healthy trans-Atlantic relationship concurrently.

President Bush obviously thinks we can. He has decided to end the unjust occupation of Germany over the next few years.

Germans plan to celebrate the exit of American troops by listening to bad techno and watching their socialist economy shrivel up and die.

German officials are worried now that the jack-booted shocktroopers of American imperialism are leaving, they will have to spend more money on their own defense and lose a considerable source of income.

Germany also has a rapidly aging older population — due in part to the disastrous conversion from the 12-month year to the euro — which will even further detrimentally affect their economy with the rising costs of end-of-life care.

At least bad straits for the economy mean that the German labor movement may finally achieve the Holy Grail of the zero-hour work week.

Predictably, this whole affair has elicited cries of rage from Democrats, who level the serious charge that Bush is making popular decisions because he is actually trying to win the election.

Richard Holbrooke, an adviser to John Kerry's presidential campaign, said "this is another example of the [Bush] administration's unilateralism."

GRANT REICHERT

Presumably, this means that if Kerry withdrew the troops he would at least make the effort multilateral by taking all the Germans along with him.

Now, I feel for the Germans; I'm not soulless after all. Sure, my soul might be dark and shriveled, and tell me things like, "you should steal Christmas, preciousssss," but it's there nonetheless.

You see, this is really the best thing for the Germans in a tough-love kind of way. As Victor Davis Hanson, head historical scribe of the vast right wing conspiracy, has pointed out, Germany, as well as "Old Europe" in general, has been insulated by its subsidized protection, leading to an adolescent view of foreign affairs and a proclivity for utopian thinking.

Germany has changed drastically, and with those changes it faces new challenges.

According to online British newspaper telegraph.co.uk, an electronic message device is being attached to toilets all over Germany. If someone lifts the lavatory seat, the device says, "Hey, stand-peeing is not allowed here and will be punished with fines, so if you don't want any trouble, you'd best sit down."

The article also notes that a certain Klaus Schwerm, no relation, has authored a book entitled "Standing Urinators: The Last Bastion of Masculinity?" I would agree.

Otto von Bismarck would be rolling in his grave if he weren't so frickin' dead.

Meanwhile, we can't let our guard fall in America. A similar talking toiletry device is being developed for America that says, "Don't you go wetting this floor cowboy, you never know who's behind you. So sit down, get your water pistol in the bowl where it belongs."

Yes, I should think it would be obvious why we are bringing more troops to the home front. We have not chosen this battle. It has chosen us.

PERSPECTIVES

Republican Party divided on gay marriage issue

THE BATTALION (TEXAS A&M U.)

COLLEGE STATION, Texas - If you have listened to any of the recent campaign speeches or news coverage of the respective presidential candidates, you will have to notice the buzzword of the week is "values." The Bush administration has staked its claim to which candidate best represents the values of this nation by forcefully backing a proposed constitutional amendment that would ban gay marriage.

Unfortunately for the administration, what the American public is witnessing is a Republican party far from united on this issue. With so few legislative days left in the session, the tragedy in this debate is that it takes away from the "people's business" at a time when it is clear that there was not even enough support to get the proposed amendment passed on the senate floor.

The Bush-Cheney campaign has certainly been persistent in alleging Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry has flip-flopped on some issues, but in regard to the proposed amendment to ban gay marriage, it is both Bush and Cheney who have changed positions since the 2000 election. In a Republican primary debate during that timeframe, Larry King asked what Bush's response would be if a state were voting on gay marriage. Bush responded by saying, "The states can do what they want to do." In addition, during a vice presidential debate, Cheney indicated, "I don't think there should necessarily be a federal policy in this area."

The rather flimsy argument used to such a reversal is that recent court decisions, such as the Massachusetts ruling allowing same-sex marriages, have placed the issue in the hands of the judicial system and that the proposed amendment will provide what Bush calls "clarity" on the issue. Despite his goal, the theatrics surrounding the debate within his own party indicate there isn't consensus on this issue at all.

A Republican strategy meeting indicated that there was not a consensus on the wording of such an amendment and Republican senators such as John McCain of Arizona have indicated they are opposed to the amendment.

The timing of this debate calls into question why the Republican leadership in the Senate has pushed this amendment that has essentially been dead on arrival. Realistically, they were never close to the two-thirds majority required for senate approval before sending it to the states for potential ratification. Look no further than high-stakes politics during an election year to explain the circus-like atmosphere the Bush administration has used to appease conservatives - many of whom have openly criticized the president in the past for not pushing hard enough for a ban on gay marriage. In an increasingly tight election year, campaign strategists know that the conservative vote, including the powerful religious right, is once again important.

It would seem that we are merely in the infancy of this debate as a nation. As is clear from Sen. Bill Frist's comments and legislation now moving through the House, this issue is not going to go away. What is interesting, though, is that recent polls, including the one conducted by the National Annenberg Election Survey, indicate that while two-thirds of those asked opposed same-sex marriage, only 43 percent favored a constitutional amendment banning gay marriage.

Back in 1967, a majority of Americans were opposed to interracial marriage despite a Supreme Court ruling that struck down laws enacting such restrictions. This indicates that the institution of marriage has certainly evolved in America over time and that, interestingly, public opinion can affect judicial progress.

Whether the acceptance of gay marriage is in the nation's immediate future or not can't be predicted, the Bush administration's use of this issue as political posturing during an election year is getting America no closer to a viable policy that will include all Americans.

TO THE EDITOR

Adult businesses column lacked needed details

Editor,

I am a Manhattan City Commissioner, and I need to expand on the information Shanna Hajek had in her column about pornography and associated businesses potentially locating in Manhattan.

The reason the Commission addressed this issue now is because there have been no guidelines whatsoever regarding sexually-oriented businesses (SOBs).

There has been some interest over the years in establishing these businesses and before we acted, they could have been placed anywhere.

The Supreme Court says we can't ban these types of businesses, or we would have, so we banned them from all residential areas, 500 feet from schools, churches, main streets, etc.

This left only a small area in the industrial area of town available. Hope this clarifies our position regarding these SOBs.

Phelps impresses despite naysayers

MICHAEL ASHFORD

American swimmer Michael Phelps is a phenomenon. What he accomplished in the pool at the 28th Olympiad in Athens, Greece, is nothing short of incredible.

In his second Olympic games, Phelps set out to best former swimmer Mark Spitz's record of seven gold medals in one Olympiad.

The hype drenched Phelps, and yet the swimmer remained calm and went about his business.

Most would buckle under the pressure of an entire nation expecting nothing less than Olympic history.

Phelps did not succumb, but he also did not achieve his goal of eight gold medals.

Does that make him a failure? Did Phelps let down his country?

Not in the least.

Instead, he did what any athlete should do under those circumstances. He went out and performed on his sport's biggest stage and gave it his best.

Phelps was rewarded with eight medals, six of which are gold.

How could anyone call this kid a failure? How could anyone possibly want to try and tarnish what this 19 year-old has done?

Phelps has come under some criticism for not living up to the expectations of winning eight gold medals.

However, Phelps did not disappoint anyone. It was the American media that was disappointing for latching on to Phelps and smothering him with unjust expectations.

Consider for a moment what Phelps has done.

Not only did he win eight medals, but that count is good enough to tie him for the record for medals earned in one Olympiad.

If Phelps had been his own country, he would be in a tie for 16th place in the medal count, ahead of forty-six other medal winning countries.

Phelps set or aided in setting two world records, breaking his own record in the 400-meter individual medley.

Consider all those physical accomplishments, and then realize that Phelps did it all with an incredible display of class rarely seen in sports these days.

Phelps never said he was going to beat Spitz's record. Instead, he gave all the credit in the world to Spitz and never complained about the expectations thrown on him by the media.

In a display of class like never before, Phelps gave up his spot in the 4x100-meter medley relay final to teammate Ian Crocker, because Phelps wanted Crocker to have the chance to win gold.

Crocker went on to help the United States win the gold, Phelps got his sixth gold medal for his participation in the preliminaries of the event, and the world witnessed a display of incredible class from a teenage swimmer who still lives with his mother.

Phelps didn't have to give up his spot on the relay team. But he did, and in doing so, he put the finishing touches on one of the greatest performances in Olympic history.

To call Phelps a disappointment for not winning eight gold medals is absurd. He is an incredible athlete in an often-forgotten sport, and yet he has captured the eyes and hearts of Americans young and old.

Michael Phelps is a phenomenon, and to say otherwise is un-American.

Michael is a junior in open-option. You can email him at sports@spokhsu.edu.

Wildcat football fans hurry out of the stands after the field gates were opened for people wanting autographs from players and coaches Wednesday evening during Fan Appreciation Day at KSU Stadium. The event also included free hot dogs and the opportunity for fans to watch an hour of practice.

Football fans got a rare glimpse at Coach Bill Snyder's program Wednesday, as the Wildcats held Fan Appreciation Day at KSU Stadium.

After not holding the event last year because of the team's preparation for the early-season BCA Classic in Kansas City, Mo., many fans arrived hours before the gates opened, hoping for the best seats from which to observe a Wildcats' practice.

The sights and sounds of the 2004 Wildcat football team preparing for its Sept. 4 home-opener against Western Kentucky welcomed fans who entered the stadium at 5 p.m.

"I mostly watched the quarterbacks and saw who was throwing the best," Blake Calhoun, junior in business management, said. "Dylan Meier was throwing a lot more accurate than he was last year."

Following the hour-long practice Snyder addressed the crowd, thanking them for their love and support of Wildcat football.

After the assistant coaches and football staff were recognized, the five team captains talked briefly. Each echoed the sentiments of his head coach, after which event management staff allowed fans onto the field to mingle, get autographs and have their pictures taken with their favorite players.

Fans watching the practice said they focused their attention on specific players, the quarterback being the most scrutinized of positions.

Tom Ruxlow, McPherson, said he came away from the practice with a better outlook on sophomore quarterback Alan Webb.

"Webb looked like he was throwing the ball very well, and he was hitting his receivers well," Ruxlow said. "I had never seen him play before."

While fans said they had some concerns about the team's linebacker, defensive and offensive line positions, most said they expected this year's team to be as good as years past.

Trent Armbrust, biology instructor, said while attending his sixth Fan Appreciation Day that he is optimistic about the team's prospects.

"They looked pretty good," Armbrust said. "I expect them to repeat as Big 12 North Champions."

Bringing their own expectations, some fans traveled from surrounding areas to enjoy the event.

"It's always fun to come and watch them practice," said Gary Catlin, of Council Grove. "It may be pretty mellow, but that's how Bill (Snyder) usually is."

NBA | Prosecution charges DNA contamination

DENVER — Two days before the start of jury selection in Kobe Bryant's rape case, prosecutors charged that crucial DNA evidence the defense had hoped to use to prove the NBA star's innocence might have been contaminated.

The judge in the case granted prosecutors' request for a hearing Thursday to question the reliability of the defense's DNA experts. The witnesses are expected to argue that the DNA evidence shows the accuser was promiscuous.

A closed hearing will also be held Thursday to discuss the roughly 100-item questionnaire prospective jurors will fill out.

Prosecutors provided no details about the possible contamination in a court filing released Wednesday. But they expressed concerns about defense expert Elizabeth Johnson, who testified in June that DNA evidence suggests the accuser had sex with another man after her encounter with Bryant and before her hospital examination the following day.

Olympics

Gardner wins bronze, retires

ATHENS, Greece — He left his shoes in the middle of the mat, maybe a piece of his heart, too. Rulon Gardner finally let his emotions out after trading Olympic gold for bronze, and the tears he cried weren't of sadness.

Gardner, so poised and dispassionate hours before, following the biggest loss of his life, became teary-eyed Wednesday after one of the most surprising gold medalists in Olympic history settled for a bronze on his return trip to the games.

His last one, too. After wearing down Iran's much-taller Sajad Barzi for a 3-0 victory and the Greco-Roman wrestling bronze at 264 1/2 pounds, Gardner sat down on the mat, an American flag draped in his arms, and took off his shoes in the traditional sign of retirement.

Then it all came out. Tears streamed down his cheeks as he carried the flag around the arena, escorted by the unmistakable cheers of a dozen family members who made the long trip from Afton, Wyo., to Athens to see if he was good for one more gold.

He wasn't, but he thought he was good enough — even if a 4-1 overtime loss to Kazakhstan's Georgi Tsursumia earlier meant he couldn't duplicate the gold he won in Sydney by beating the Russian Alexander Karelin.

Jones advances to finals

ATHENS, Greece — Without any of the fanfare that accompanied her historic quest for five gold medals in at the 2000 Games, Marion Jones quietly advanced to the final of the long jump in her first appearance of these Olympics.

Jones qualified for the final with the seventh-best jump of Wednesday's qualifying round: 21 feet, 11 1/2 inches.

Four years ago, Jones' quest for five golds ended in the long jump. This time, she made her Athens debut in the event. She drew only a smattering of applause here, with little of the celebrity worship that engulfed her in Sydney.

At the U.S. trials this summer, she failed to qualify in the 100 and dropped out of the 200, citing fatigue.

Swoopes leads U.S. to semis

ATHENS, Greece — Hushing a boisterous crowd with its all-around domination, the United States advanced to the semifinals Wednesday with a 102-72 victory over Greece, which had heart, the home court and little else.

Sheryl Swoopes scored 12 points, one of six players in double digits. Now, only two games stand between the Americans and a third straight gold medal. They'll play Russia (5-1), which beat the Czech Republic 70-49, on Friday. The semifinal winners advance to the gold-medal game on Saturday.

Friday's game will be a rematch of the 2002 world championships final, which the United States won 79-74 after Russia pulled within a point with 31/2 minutes left.

Women's golf team looks toward future

By Angie Hanson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's time to forget the past for the women's golf team.

Last season the team finished ninth in the Big 12. This year, however, the team has greater expectations.

"We want to put the ninth-place finish behind us. For the returners, it will be a good motivator," Coach Kristi Knight said.

Knight said she believes confidence will be a key factor to the team's success.

The Wildcats lost Christine Boucher, Karen Quintelier and Morgan Hagler to graduation, but with four players returning and three new freshmen, the team remains optimistic.

"We're a young team this year with a new group of girls and a new dynamic. Having confidence in ourselves and each other will be crucial," senior Stephanie Limoges said.

One advantage the team possesses, Knight said, is experience. All four returners have been a part of a winning team, played in their state amateurs and dealt with disappointment.

"Winning and losing are both very good learning experiences," she said.

Despite having veteran players, the team is investing faith in the three freshmen.

"They are going to have to get better every day and are going to have to get that fighting and scoring attitude very quickly," Knight said.

Freshman Kali Quick said she is willing to take on the challenge.

"I want to try to play the best I've ever played," Quick said.

The competitive spirit will be an asset for the team this season, Knight said, as the friendly competition between the teammates may enable them to improve.

"This season, the number one spot on the team is up for grabs," Knight said. "The better the battle for the spot, the better the team will be."

Currently the team members are focusing on improving their short game, which proved to be the biggest challenge last season.

The Wildcats' first tournament is on Monday, Sept. 13, at the Ptarmigan Classic in Fort Collins, Colo.

"For a successful season, the girls have to try to improve everyday and always be fighting for every shot and stroke," Knight said. "All four returners are going to have to step up and be better than they were a year ago."

Campus carnival

UPC event offers free activities, involvement

By Paul Suter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some students may be tired of spending money on books, food and tuition.

The fifth annual Union Expo and Activities Carnival may be the event for those students, because it's free.

The Expo hosted by the Union Program Council, is from 6 to 9 tonight at the Union Courtyard and first floor concourse.

Angela Moen, junior in public relations and UPC Traditions chair, said she is excited about the event.

"It's a tradition every year to welcome the new students with fun activities, and it is a way to get involved on campus," Moen said.

She said one of the more popular venues at the Expo is the caricature drawings.

"There will be a cartoon artist that will draw you by yourself or with a friend," Moen said. "They can incorporate your favorite sport or hobby with the drawing."

Candle art is also a favorite attraction among students, Moen said.

"Students can make their own layered design in a glass holder using different colors of tiny balls of wax," said Moen.

Other events at the Expo include post cards home, photo keychains, balloon art by Shawn the Balloon Guy, among the arts and crafts.

"The balloons and arts and crafts can bring out everyone's youthful side," Moen said.

UPC also will host comedian John Roy, who won CBS' "Star Search" comedian battle in 2003 and is on the upcoming Aspen Comedy Festival for HBO. He will be performing at 7:30 p.m. in the Union Courtyard.

"I do many topics that students can relate to," Roy said. "I do all sorts of pop music, 80's and 90's themes, age relations and college life."

Roy's first performance on stage was in 1997, and he has been a full time

"Students should come, because it will be very funny," Roy said. "I am looking forward to coming."

Body First will offer massages at the Expo, said owner Doug Sellers.

"It will be Body First's third year participating," Sellers said. "There will be four therapists doing the massages that focus on back, neck, and shoulders."

Later events at the Expo include a free screening of "Dead Man On Campus" at 9 p.m. and free Rock It Bowl from 9 to 11 p.m.

Krista Biddle, junior in public relations, said the Expo is a great way to meet people.

"It's a great opportunity to get involved with other student organizations and is a way to get to know other people," Biddle said. "It also promotes diversity among the students as well."

In addition to the Expo, the Office of Student Activities and Services is hosting the Activities Carnival from 6:30 to 8 p.m. in the Union Ballroom.

Gayle Spencer, director of the OSAS, said there will be 125 organizations at the Carnival.

"Underclassmen are strongly encouraged to come," Spencer said. "It is important to get involved on campus because they get to know more people."

Advice on food preparation can help prevent disasters

For many of us, our first foray into the world of cooking comes within the first couple of years away from home, and the results are often sketchy at best.

My first effort at making macaroni and cheese required the assistance of the Manhattan Fire Department. They were understanding and thoughtfully pointed out the directions for proper preparation on the back of the box.

Luckily we can learn from our mistakes and are able move on and prosper. Most of us, anyway.

I'm sure you all know that person—the one that has never been able to make the connection between the cat running out of the kitchen in flames after he left the burner on, or couldn't figure out why the electric can opener wouldn't work because it wasn't plugged in.

If you are that person, chances are you have no idea what I'm talking about. It is for you that I write this column.

For those of you cooking for the first time, I have advice to help you keep all your fingers or remain free of disfigurement by the beaters you tried to lick before you removed them from the mixer.

My gift to you is a list of kitchen safety tips. Remove this list and keep it where you can see it at all times.

1. Always keep your kitchen knives sharp. This may sound like a conflict of interest, though. It may not make sense to keep sharp knives, right? Wrong.

A dull knife will slip off of food with greater ease, and the cut will be jagged. It won't heal, cleanly and you will look like you've been in a knife fight in Bali. A sharp knife will slice easily through food (and appendages).

Should it slip and cut you, you will be left with a nice, clean wound that will heal easily and leave a minimum of scarring.

2. Always remember to keep food on the counter, stove or plate before eating it. Try to avoid situations in which food items might enter your body unnaturally.

I recall a scenario in which a young man who is known by a close friend of mine inserted a bean deep into his nose. Don't worry, I was speechless too.

The bean didn't resurface, and several months later, when he felt something was wrong and finally told his parents, the bean had germinated and the sprout had begun its long journey towards his unsuspecting brain.

"For those of you cooking for the first time, I have advice to help you keep all your fingers..."

The brain was lucky and the renegade sprout was removed. It is thriving in a pot on his kitchen windowsill.

3. Keep children and pets away from the kitchen. Recall, if you will, "National Lampoon's Christmas Vacation." Wily pets can overturn garbage cans, creating a hazard and attracting ants. Appliances can be dangerous to them as well. I've eaten in enough restaurants to know that Moo Shoo cat (they call it chicken) doesn't taste half-bad. But the electric shock applied to Furry's body after chewing on the blender cord you left plugged in will only burn him/her beyond recognition. This will set off the smoke alarm and scare the children.

Kids can get into some poisonous stuff as well, so lock up all cabinets that are within their reach.

4. In the event (heaven forbid) that you are cooking with grease or oil and a fire erupts, never attempt to put it out with water. Water and oil do not mix (think of a Wal-Mart parking lot after it rains). The hot grease will spray all over everything, including you. Simply cover the pan or pot with its lid to cut off the fire's flow of oxygen.

5. Keep electrical appliances away from water. Just like oil, electricity doesn't mix with water. Never try to plug in or unplug an electrical appliance when your hands are wet, as water is an excellent conductor of electricity.

Should your wet hands drip onto the plug while it is still in the socket, you will receive an instant buzz the likes of which your bong could never give you. Please don't take this lightly, as death could result.

In fact, your best bet is to have a family member, or a chimpanzee in a pink tutu (a monkey in people clothes is always funny), operate the equipment for you.

I hope to add to your list of helpful tidbits in the future, as this certainly can't cover them all. We really do enjoy having you around. Without you emergency room employees would be jobless and we wouldn't have any silly anecdotes to relay at Christmas. Be safe.

Will is a senior in psychology. You can e-mail him at edge@pub.ksu.edu.

Illinois sues Dave Matthews Band

The state of Illinois sued the Dave Matthews Band on Tuesday for allegedly dumping up to 800 pounds of liquid human waste from a bus into the Chicago River, dousing a tour boat filled with passengers.

The lawsuit accuses the band and one of its bus drivers of violating state water pollution and public nuisance laws. It seeks $70,000 in civil penalties.

"Our driver has stated that he was not involved in this incident," band spokesman John Vlautin said in a statement.

He said the band "will continue to be cooperative in this investigation."

According to the lawsuit, on Aug. 8 a bus leased by the band was heading to a downtown hotel where members were staying. As the bus crossed the Kinzie Street bridge, the driver allegedly emptied the contents of the septic tank through the bridge's metal grating into the river below.

More than 100 people on an architecture tour were showered with foul-smelling waste. The attorney general's office said no one was seriously injured.

After the incident, the boat's captain turned the vessel around and took passengers back to the dock.

Jay-Z and R. Kelly plan fall tour

Jay-Z and R. Kelly are going back in time. Their planned 2002 tour never materialized because of child pornography charges against Kelly. Now they're set to open the "Best of Both Worlds" tour Sept. 30 in Chicago.

The U.S. tour, which takes its name from their 2002 album, will travel to more than 40 cities before ending Nov. 28 in Phoenix, Ariz.

They appeared together last year at Jay-Z's concert at Madison Square Garden in New York City.

Kelly, whose real name is Robert Sylvester Kelly, faces 14 counts of child pornography in Chicago and has pleaded innocent.

Kelly's new album, "Happy People/Save Me," was released Tuesday.

Siegfried & Roy Co. withholds video

Despite two subpoenas from federal authorities, the company behind the Siegfried & Roy magic show has refused to turn over video of last year's tiger attack on illusionist Roy Horn, the Associated Press has learned.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture attempted to obtain video of the show but Vienna, Va.-based Feld Entertainment would not hand over the footage, a USDA source familiar with the case said Tuesday.

Student senators set goals, discuss budget at retreat

By Addie Laue
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student senators kicked the year off with a productive start at their annual retreat.

"The retreat, held Aug. 19 at Pizza Hut and the K-State Student Union, was a time for us to regroup after being apart during summer months," Vicki Conner, arts and sciences senator, said. "We had activities to get to know new members, spent some time working on committee goals, reviewed parliamentary procedure and participated in a diversity training session."

Ben Fenwick, a new arts and sciences senator, said the retreat served as a means to get acquainted with other members, and it would help improve communication among senators.

"There were many activities that allowed members of Senate to get to know each other so that the ability to communicate and become more in tune to each other's opinions," he said.

Michael Burns, privilege fee committee chair, said the retreat was more than just a get to know you exercise.

"As far as the privilege fee committee, my committee has set the goal of thoroughly reviewing all the agencies being reviewed this year, as well as continuing to work to keep the fees as low as possible," Burns said. "The committee really understands the financial burden the students are facing."

Fenwick, also a member of the privilege fee committee, said he agreed that active goals have been set for the committee.

"We have created many new goals to help ensure that our committee operates in an efficient manner, have increased public knowledge of our actions, and worked towards acting in a professional but fun way," Fenwick said.

Burns said they also are reviewing the operations budget and repair/replacement budget for the campus radio station, KSDB-FM 91.9.

The Office of Student Activities and Services Student and Recreational Services also are privilege fees set to be reviewed within the year.

SGA members tackle projects

Senators focus on faculty

By Annie Lewis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Governing Association members didn't get a summer break.

Student Body President Hayley Urkevich said her attention was focused on all areas of concern and how to fix them.

"We have worked hard to maintain tuition increases in the single digits and brainstorming ideas to fix the parking problem," Urkevich said.

SGA did research to prepare themselves for dialogues with administration and faculty, she said.

"The administration has a high trust in the student government," Urkevich said. "They don't take what we say lightly."

She said the biggest project she and student body vice president Erik Ankrom worked on is the student portal.

"We are really excited about the student portal," Urkevich said.

"It will be a place where students can communicate with each other and their elected officials."

Other members of the cabinet worked on individual projects over the summer.

Honors Program Liaison Maggie Trambly conducted research for a university-wide honors program.

"We don't have a university wide honors program, because we don't have the funding right now," Trambly said. "I am in the process of meeting with the provost."

It was the individual efforts over the summer that helped the student government come together stronger in the school year in years past, Bill Harlan, assistant coordinator of student activities, said.

"They spent individual time researching for their projects," Harlan said.

Student Governing Association

Student portal becoming a reality

Web site will connect SGA, students

By Annie M. Lewis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For years a student portal has been discussed by Student Governing Association candidates, but it remained a far cry from reality.

This semester, Hayley Urkevich and Erik Ankrom, student body president and vice president, said that day has come finally.

"It's actually going to happen," she said. "We knew that all along, but we're glad we've made the progress we have so far."

The portal will be a Web site for students to fill out on-line surveys, post ads for roommate needs or to communicate with SGA.

Other services include weather conditions, movie listings, campus news and church/faith directory.

"It will be an easier way for the student government to judge what the student body is feeling," Ankrom said. "It will be an easily accessible Web site anyone can use."

The project officially has a home—a small office in Kedzie Hall—and the staff will begin in the first part of September, Urkevich said.

"We're running an ad in the Collegian all this week," she said. "Any student, graduate or undergrad, freshmen to senior is encouraged to apply."

Positions are available to help run the Web site.

"We encourage anyone who wants to be a part of this to apply," Urkevich said. "It will be a Web site run by students for students."

She said there will be five paid team leader positions, as well as several internship opportunities.

"These positions will provide a great, real-life opportunity for anyone," Urkevich said.

The progress made last semester and over the summer, she said, is what made it possible for her administration to jump right in with the project this semester.

"We're really going to let the people we hire run with it," she said.

According to the application, the paid positions will range in pay from $8,600 per year to $1,400 per year.

Urkevich said applications are due Sept. 3, and the interview process will take place during the week of Sept. 6 through Sept. 10.

The idea of the Internet portal began before Urkevich and Ankrom decided to run for office.

"When I was on the Student Governing Association, this site was a project I researched," Ankrom said. "Now the legislation has been passed, and it is really taking off."

Urkevich attributes the success of the portal to the great team she and Ankrom make.

STUDENT BODY VICE PRESIDENT

"We compliment each other well," Urkevich said. "He knows the technical side of things and I have the how-to attitude to get it done."

Senior Associate Dean of Student Life Carla Jones said the portal will be an excellent tool for all students.

"Increasing the ease of communication will be a big help," Jones said. "The students' concerns will reach the leaders in a more timely manner."

Investigation faults unit for prison abuses

By John J. Lumpkin
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Twenty-seven people attached to an intelligence unit at Abu Ghraib prison near Baghdad either approved or participated in the abuse of Iraqi prisoners, an Army investigation found.

"We discovered serious misconduct and a loss of moral values," Gen. Paul Kern, the head of the investigation, told reporters Wednesday at the Pentagon.

Of the 27 individuals accused of complicity in the abuse, 23 were members of the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade that oversaw interrogations at Abu Ghraib. The other four were civilian contractors working for the unit.

Six more soldiers in the unit, and two additional contractors, witnessed the abuse but failed to report it, which also violates regulations, Kern said.

All of these people may face charges or disciplinary action for abuses that occurred between late July 2003 and early February 2004.

Investigators recommended that an additional five people, including Col. Thomas Pappas, the commander of the 205th, face possible disciplinary action, Army officials said. While these individuals did not take part in abuses, they contributed to the conditions that allowed them to take place, officials said.

"There is no single, simple explanation for why the abuse at Abu Ghraib happened," according to the Fay report. One of the senior investigators was Maj. Gen. George Fay.

The report blames the abuses on several factors: "misconduct (ranging from inhumane to sadistic) by a small group of morally corrupt soldiers and civilians, a lack of discipline on the part of leaders and soldiers," and a "failure or lack of leadership" by higher command in Iraq.

when you tell them you're not 100 percent sure of where you're living," he said.

Sigma Epsilon conducts weekly chapter meetings and formal dinners in the K-State Student Union, Coleman said.

"We set up a deal with the union to do our meetings or dinners on Monday nights," he said.

Tina Griffin, director of dining for the Union, said the Union wants to help Sig Ep.

"They use the Bluemont Room on Monday nights," she said. "They do pay for their meals, but the room charge was waived by Bernard Pitts. Bernard did this because we are here for the students and we need to accommodate them somehow."

The catering staff isn't taking on much more of a workload, Griffin said.

"We just work it into the production schedule," she said. "We are here for other catering events so it's no problem."

RUSSIA | Officials add security to airports after dual plane crashes

communication from the crew that we're having trouble," he said.

Russian authorities had expressed concern that Chechen separatists might stage new attacks before the Sunday vote, but there was no rush by officials to tie the crashes to Chechnya — a determination that would underline the government's failure to quell the decade-old insurgency.

"Several versions are being examined, including a terrorist attack, and other possibilities — the human and technical factor," Russia's top prosecutor, Vladimir Ustinov, told President Vladimir Putin during a televised meeting about the Tuesday night crashes.

Ustinov said the Prosecutor General's Office had instituted criminal proceedings into both crashes and sent two teams of investigators to the crash sites, the ITAR-Tass news agency reported. The teams are headed by his deputies.

"We have not rejected any of the leads," Ustinov said, according to the news agency.

Putin, who expressed sympathy for the families of the dead, did not publicly address the terror question. After designating Thursday a national day of mourning, he ordered the Federal Security Service to investigate the crashes and said he wanted "unbiased and reliable information" from the probe. The service is a successor agency to the KGB.

While officials spoke cautiously on the terrorism issue, Russian police said security was being tightened at airports and other transport hubs and public places.

The planes took off about 40 minutes apart from the single terminal at Moscow's newly renovated Domodedovo airport, which is about 14 miles outside of Moscow. They both crashed a few minutes apart just before 11 p.m., according to initial time estimates.

Domodedovo airport said in a statement that both planes "went through the standard procedure of preparation for flight" and "the procedures were carried out properly."

In Washington, U.S. officials said they had no information on the disaster, but said American agencies were ready to provide help if asked.

"Our understanding is, there is no cause that has been ruled in or no cause that has been ruled out," State Department deputy spokesman Adam Ereli said.

Outside experts expressed skepticism that anything but violence could be behind two planes crashing at almost the same time hundreds of miles apart.

"That's pretty far out there on the chance bar," said Bob Francis, former vice chairman of the U.S. National Transportation Safety Board.

BUSH | Kerry accuses incumbent of using group for smear campaign

because of an ad the Swift Boat Veterans group ran accusing Kerry of exaggerating his Vietnam War record, an issue that has dominated the campaign since early August.

Kerry has fired back by accusing Bush of using the group to run a smear campaign for him. Democrats have jumped on any tie, even if legal, to back up that claim.

"The sudden resignation of Bush's top lawyer doesn't end the extensive web of connections between George Bush and the group trying to smear John Kerry's military record," Kerry-

Edwards campaign manager Mary Beth Cahill said Wednesday. "In fact, it only confirms the extent of those connections."

In Ginsberg's letter to Bush, he accused the media of a "stunning double standard" between its focus on the activities of groups supporting Kerry and those that oppose him.

Kerry is the subject of complaints by the Bush campaign and the Republican National Committee accusing his campaign of illegally coordinating anti-Bush ads with soft-money groups on the Democratic side, allegations Kerry and the groups deny.

Shiite cleric, al-Sadr reach peace agreement

By Abdul Hussein al-Obeidi
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NAJAF, Iraq — Iraq's top Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, made a dramatic return to Najaf on Thursday and swiftly won agreement from a rebel cleric and the government to end three weeks of fighting between his militia and U.S.-Iraqi forces.

The renegade Muqtada al-Sadr accepted the proposal in a face-to-face meeting Thursday night with the 75-year-old al-Sistani, Iraq's most influential Shiite cleric. Hours afterward, the government also agreed to the deal.

Al-Sistani returned to Iraq after heart treatment in London to intervene for the first time in the bloody conflict, drawing thousands of followers who marched on Najaf and massed on its outskirts.

In the 24 hours before al-Sistani entered the holy city, more than 90 Iraqis were killed in fighting — including 27 killed when mortars barraged a mosque in neighboring Kufa, where thousands had gathered to march into Najaf in support of al-Sistani's mission.

Fighting eased after al-Sistani arrived, when the U.S. military and the Iraqi government called a 24-hour cease-fire.

The acceptance by the young, fire-brand preacher al-Sadr — whose militia has been battling U.S. and Iraqi forces since Aug. 5 — doesn't necessarily mean an end to the crisis. He has agreed to peace proposals before, and they have fallen apart quickly.

But State Minister Qassim Dawoud, announcing the administration's acceptance, was optimistic.

U.S. and coalition forces will pull out of Najaf as soon as interim Prime Minister Iyad Ailawi orders them to leave, Dawoud said.

"Brothers, we have entered the door to peace," he said. He added that the government would not try to arrest al-Sadr, who was being sought for an alleged role in the slaying of a rival cleric last year.

The five-point plan called for Najaf and Kufa to be declared weapons-free cities, for all foreign forces to withdraw from Najaf, for police to be in charge of security, for the government to compensate those harmed by the fighting and for a census to be taken to prepare for elections expected in the country by January.

Calling SafeRide last weekend wasn't a safe bet for a ride, but the outlook for this weekend is much better.

Last weekend, Shawna Hett, sophomore in kinesiology, said she called looking for a ride and was turned away.

"I called SafeRide and tried to get a ride, and they turned me down because I wasn't at the bars," Hett said. "It made me upset, because so many count on SafeRide to get them home safely."

Emily Rosen, sophomore in mass communications, said she was denied transportation, too.

"A lot of people I know had been turned down by SafeRide," Rosen said.

Katie Bartko, director of SafeRide, said the rumors that SafeRide's rules had changed were untrue.

"It is not true that SafeRide now only offers rides home from the bars," Bartko said.

Bartko said she attributed the confusion to the new cab company.

"It was just a misunderstanding," she said, "From now on students will be able to get rides."

Full refunds for books end today

Students pay hundreds of dollars each year on textbooks and other supplies to prepare for classes, often to realize they won't need them.

However, students still have an opportunity to return their books today.

Varney's and the Union Bookstore will accept textbook returns for incorrect, canceled or dropped class through today.

Varney's textbook manager Dan Walter said Varney's is giving students a week and a half versus the week other colleges give students to return textbooks.

Making a comeback

Krystallos opens in downtown after Aggieville fire

By Katie Lane
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For 16 years, Krystallos, a retail store, supplied its Aggieville customers with an eclectic mix of products ranging from jewelry to clothing.

When Lin Rose, the owner of Krystallos, was called on May 16, 2003, she was stunned to find out the business she built from scratch was destroyed in a fire.

"The store was there one day, and the next day it was gone. In the beginning I was just in shock. There was so much to be done that I kept busy for a long time afterwards," Rose said.

The business shut down after the electrical fire spread from Aggie Station bar to Krystallos.

After more than a year of rebuilding her business, Rose has reopened Krystallos in a new location at 405 Poyntz Ave.

LEAVING AGGIEVILLE

Rose opened Krystallos in 1987

after graduating with an art degree from K-State. When she began the business, she was one of two employees. After 17 years in Manhattan, her business has continued to thrive.

"When I first opened, the mall had just opened. Downtown lost a lot of business and Aggieville had a lot of vacancies, as well," Rose said. "Since then, we've seen both Aggieville and downtown have a lot more retail."

One of the disadvantages of leaving Aggieville, Rose said, was the loss of students who window-shopped at night. Cheryl Sieben, director of Aggieville Business Association, said Krystallos' move to downtown was a loss for Aggieville.

"They were such an asset to Aggieville. She will be missed. We wish her the best of luck in her new location," Sieben said. "Anytime you lose a business like that, it's a little bit of a loss. She was unique."

MOVING DOWNTOWN

Rose said she decided to move to the downtown location following a disagreement she had with her previous landlord. Even though the store saw 16 years of success in Aggieville, Rose said she still was happy to be downtown.

"We're excited about being downtown and being close to specialty

Your guide to this weekend's entertainment

Lindsey Bauman | COLLEGIAN

K-State's Gabby Guerre and Lisa Martin go up for a block against Kansas during a game last September at Ahearn Field House. The team will host Purple and White Scrimmage this weekend.

1 | JUST SPIKE IT

Fans can get their first look at the 2004-05 women's volleyball team this weekend as the team hosts the Purple and White Scrimmage.

Fans can get an up-close glimpse of this year's talent, led by volleyball veterans such as senior setter Gabby Guerre, middle blocker Lisa Martin and senior outside hitter Valerie Heijas. The event closes the team's preseason drills, and the team's season kicks off Sept. 1 at home against Oral Roberts. The Purple and White Scrimmage will begin at 7 p.m. Saturday at Ahearn Field House.

Filmmaker Morgan Spurlock exposes the dangers of fast food in "Super-Size Me." The documentary will be shown in the Union this weekend.

2 | YES, I WOULD LIKE FRIES WITH THAT

Salad will never look so good after after viewing documentaries like "Super-Size Me."

Filmmaker Morgan Spurlock puts on celluloid his goal of eating nothing but McDonald's food for each meal, every day for a month, in an effort to uncover the link between obesity and overindulgence in fast food. Speculation has arisen that the documentary was the reason McDonald's has announced it will remove the super size option from its menu.

The movie, sponsored by the Union Program Council, will show at 7 and 9:30 p.m. Friday and Saturday and 8 p.m. Sunday in Forum Hall of the K-State Student Union. Admission is $2.

3 | SING FOR YOUR ICE CREAM

The marriage of singing, dessert and buddy cop films has never been so sweet. After viewing "Super-Size Me," belt out a few tunes and add another notch to your belt for some ice cream in the Union.

UPC's After Hours at 9 tonight tonight features karaoke and crafts in the Union Courtyard, followed by free ice cream sundaes in Union Station. Top the evening off with the comical movie remake of "Starsky and Hutch" at midnight. All events are free and open to the public.

5 | LEND A HAND (OR PAW)

When you buy that old sofa or that alarm clock this weekend, think of your furry friends.

The Riley County Humane Society will sponsor its annual yard sale from 8 a.m. to 1 p.m. Saturday at McCall's Storage, unit 124. All proceeds from the sale benefit the society, which provides animal education, spay/neuter services and animal adoption services. For more information, call 776-8433 or visit www.humane.mhantank.org.

Schools increase computer usage

By Elena McVicar
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

High schools and colleges want to ensure students have access to a computer whenever and wherever needed.

High schools across Kansas are turning their schools into wireless campuses and checking out laptops at the beginning of the year to each student. Hays High School and Southwest College are two of these institutions, but K-State officials do not plan any changes here.

This year, Hays and Southwest are taking part in a one-on-one laptop initiative.

Adam Pfeifer, freshman in architecture engineering, graduated in May from Hays High School, and worked all summer preparing the laptops for student usage this fall.

"We would work outlandish hours," he said. "Some nights we would never go home. It took us forever to get all 950 computers ready for the school year."

While there are several Kansas high schools participating in a one-on-one initiative, not many campuses are following their lead. Only one campus gives all full-time students laptops — Southwestern College in Winfield, Kan., has been doing this since 1999.

Todd Moore, director of admissions at Southwestern College, said the computers have been beneficial.

"At first the laptops were a gimmick, but we soon realized how easier many things are when everyone is using the same network and has 24-hour access to a computer," Moore said.

"Students get a free laptop when they enroll, and in two years they turn that in and get a new one. It comes with a CD and DVD burner, as well."

Although students at Southwestern may still bring a computer from home many elect not to, Moore said.

"One bad thing for the students is that with a laptop they can never hide from the professor. There are no excuses for not being able to access a computer," he said.

"However, a positive thing is that students work daily with programs that will use when they get a job. For example, one of our education graduates got hired because he had used the program Blackboard regularly in college."

Amy Buller, K-State admissions representative, said although K-State doesn't offer this service, it is still advanced technologically.

"We have one of the more wired campuses in the U.S. We've been ranked in Yahoo, Intel and the Princeton Review for being one of the most connected and wireless campuses," Buller said.

There are six main computer labs on campus, and five are open 24 hours. Buller said the capabilities for the students to use computers are tremendous. If a student needed a computer to use, there should be no problem finding one.

K-State students are not being left behind in the job market for not knowing certain software, either.

"We don't require all of our students to know all kinds of different programs, but we do cover information such as what information packet or Web sites would be available for their use when they teach," said Mike Perl, assistant dean of the College of Education. "We also require that they use some of these materials."

"The students have the opportunity to learn a great deal about computers. They are exposed to many different programs before they graduate, because different schools use different programs."

Just because K-State doesn't hand out laptops doesn't mean it's behind in the technology race.

"I've never heard a student complain because there was not a computer to use when he or she needed one," Buller said.

Student Senate holds 1st meeting of semester

By Scott Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student senators unanimously referred two resolutions regarding funding for student organizations to the Allocations Committee during its first meeting of the semester Thursday night.

The first resolution, numbered 04/05/05, returned unspent funds from last year to the reserve accounts of numerous organizations on campus.

Allocations Chair Lisa Tirrell said there was no single reason the funds went unspent, but she said many budgeted events — such as guest speakers — never happened.

The second resolution, numbered 04/05/06, would allocate a total of $12,250 to women's soccer and men's lacrosse club sports, respectively.

In other business, resolutions to appoint students to various boards passed unanimously.

The resolutions were authored by student body president Hayley Urkevich and vice president Erik Ankrom to fill openings in the governing association.

The senators, who met for the first time this semester, were treated to an ice cream social, featuring Call Hall ice cream, by Dean of Student Life Pat Bosco, who commended the body during the first open period for its excellent work.

TO THE POINT

Professors must question books' necessity in class

It is no secret that tuition and other school-related expenses are on the rise.

The issue of books should not be one that is far from professors' minds when formulating their syllabi.

Books for a 12-hour schedule routinely cost upwards of $200, and can sometimes encroach on the $500 mark.

Yet, in many classes, the book is rarely used.

Professors should consider when planning their classes whether the book is truly a necessity to perform well in the class.

Undoubtedly, textbooks can be an extra resource to enrich students' knowledge of the subject, but if it isn't required for satisfactory performance on the tests, students shouldn't be asked to buy it.

If books are necessary, professors should research the cost of the textbooks before ordering them.

Even with the rise of cheaper online sources for books, they still come with a hefty price tag, and often that burden can surpass available amounts of financial aid.

Students should be able to afford to live and learn at the same time.

Test anxiety

Schools place too much focus on exam scores

ABBY HILES

Yesterday I received an e-mail from UFM announcing Test Prep Classes for the GRE, LSAT and other post-graduate standardized tests.

I was completely bummed out—not because UFM is actually offering a class that would do me good (unlike aerobic belly dancing or wine tasting), but because it reminded me that this is my last year of college. The countdown to my own bout with the GRE is looming.

Like thousands of others on campus, this little test determines my entire future. If I do well, I get into the grad school of my dreams. (Columbia, can you hear me?)

If I don't, I am destined to either choose which parent to move back in with after graduation (something I'm sure neither are really excited about) or suffer through an entry level job that, no doubt, has nothing to do with my major and that I will hate thoroughly.

So in a nutshell: doing well on this test is imperative.

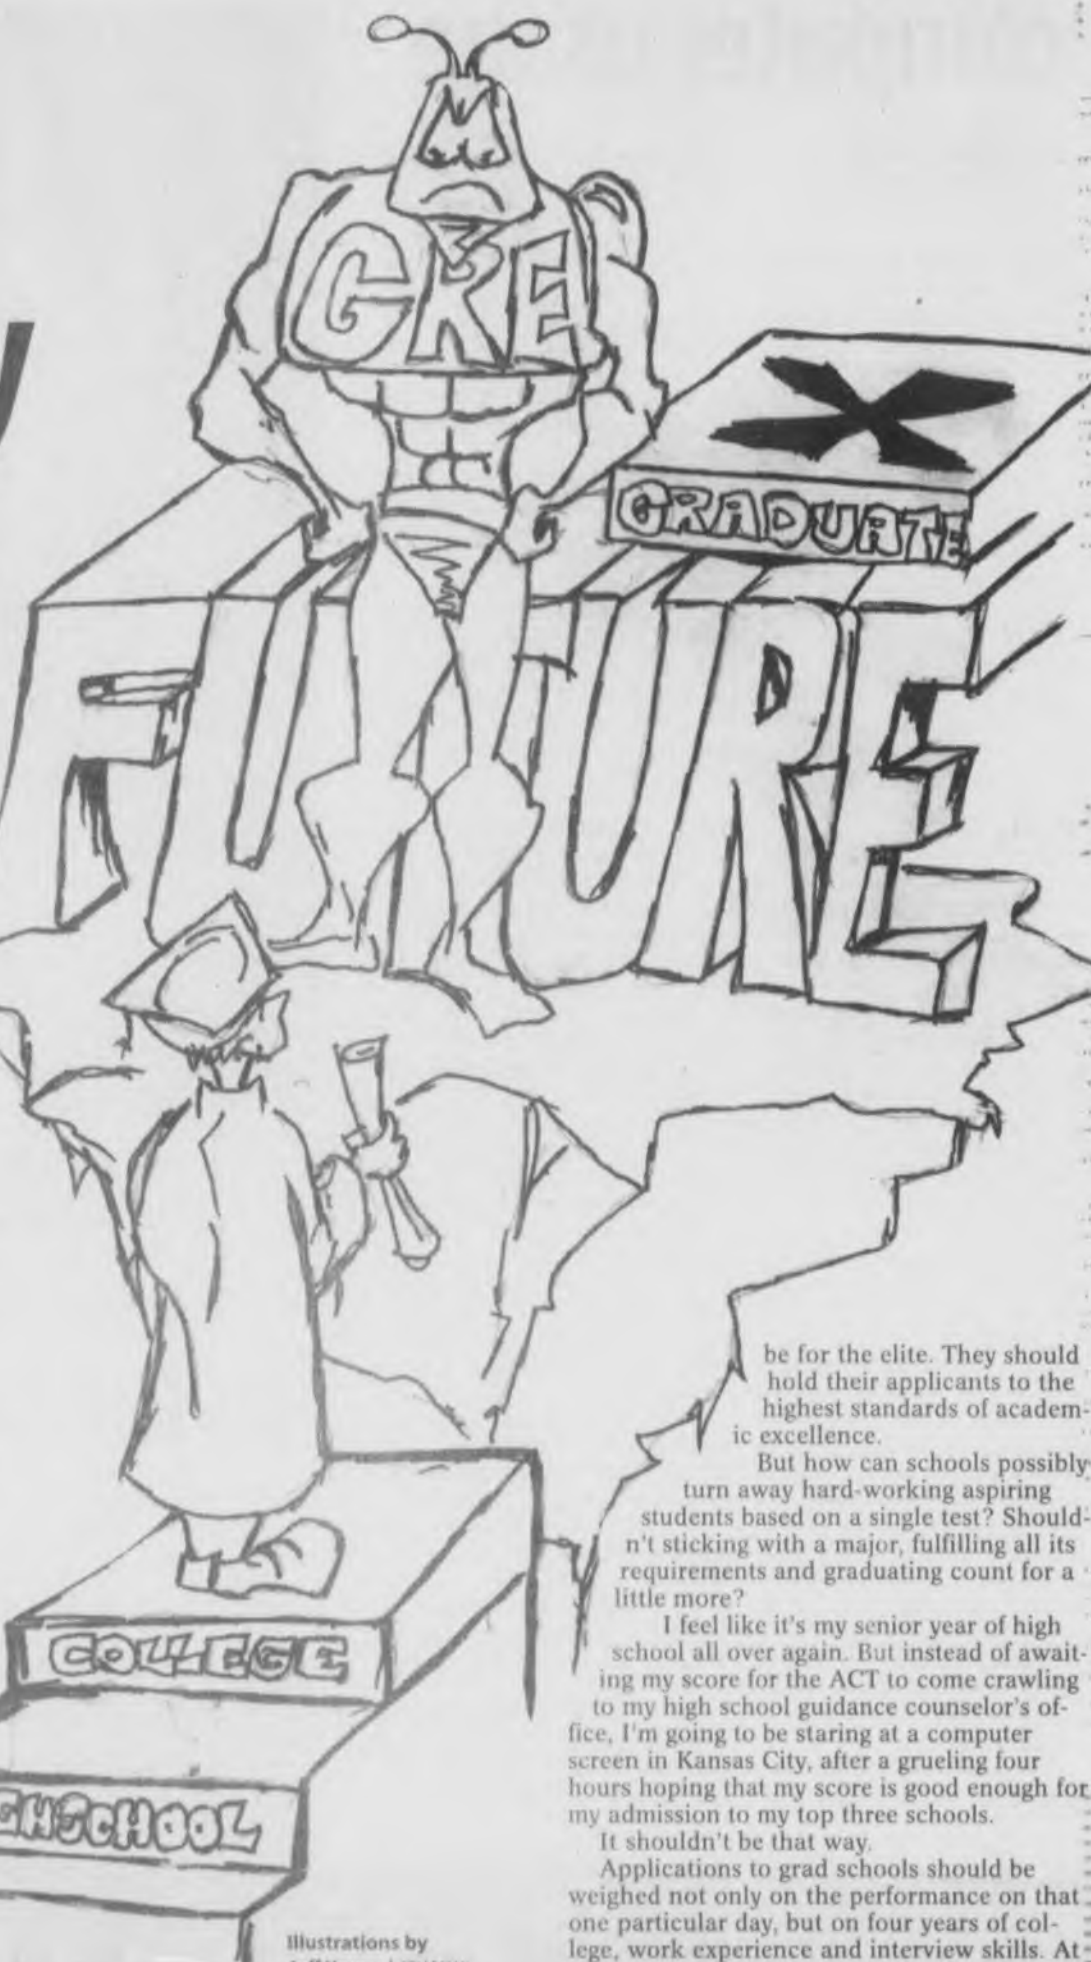

The GRE isn't the only post-graduate test that hangs its head over the fall semester. The LSAT is administered in October, along with sections of the MCAT. Every form of this sadistic type of exam takes place this quarter, and I'm not the only one whose life is suspended in anticipation.

What kills me about these tests is that they almost override everything you did in the past four (or sometimes five or six) years of undergraduate work. At some graduate schools (law and medical, alike), your performance on these exams accounts for 60 percent of your admission score.

The four hours of your life spent taking your respective test outweighs the four years of college leading up to it. A clear example of how the educational system giveth and then taketh away.

So you have a 4.0 grade point average, eh? That's nice, but if your LSAT score is below 170, it doesn't matter that you were president of the Pre-Law Society or a member of the nationally-ranked mock-trial team.

Poor performance on this one scholastic day can undo everything you worked hard for Illustrations by

your whole academic career.

You volunteered for the Red Cross for four years, are set to graduate cum laude in your respective college, and interned at a doctor's office during the summers for no pay? Guess what?

Your MCAT score were not quite good enough. So brush up on your organic chemistry and enroll in EMT certification classes, because you weren't even good enough to score a spot on the top third of the wait list at the state school down the road.

I understand that graduate schools should be for the elite. They should hold their applicants to the highest standards of academic excellence.

But how can schools possibly turn away hard-working aspiring students based on a single test? Shouldn't sticking with a major, fulfilling all its requirements and graduating count for a little more?

I feel like it's my senior year of high school all over again. But instead of awaiting my score for the ACT to come crawling to my high school guidance counselor's office, I'm going to be staring at a computer screen in Kansas City, after a grueling four hours hoping that my score is good enough for my admission to my top three schools.

It shouldn't be that way.

Applications to grad schools should be weighed not only on the performance on that one particular day, but on four years of college, work experience and interview skills. At least that way undergrads across the nation could feel a little bit better about the upcoming tests in October.

So as my designated date for the GRE comes closer, my anxiety level crawls to an all time high. "What can undergrads do to ensure victory on their test dates?" I ask myself. I don't know about everyone else, but those classes at UFM are looking better.

Looks like no more belly dancing for me.

Service debate harms election's progress

Media, candidates put unneeded emphasis on Vietnam

Lately, we've been hearing a lot about both major presidential candidates' records in (or not in) Vietnam.

The reason is that while President Bush was busily dodging mosquitoes and other pesky insects in Texas and Alabama, John Kerry was dodging bullets and Viet Cong in Vietnam and Cambodia...maybe.

Of course, there is no doubt that Kerry served in Vietnam and was awarded several medals, but some are questioning his record.

A group called Swift Boat Veterans for Truth has raised doubts about aspects of the record on which Kerry has based his campaign.

On the one side are military records and personal testimony of those involved; on the other are the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth.

Unfortunately, human witnesses and military records are fallible.

Another issue that has been raised is Kerry's claim to have spent Christmas Eve of 1968 in Cambodia, even though "U.S. forces, entering Cambodia was forbidden," according to the Washington Times.

Later, Kerry's campaign reported that this memory was incorrect; Kerry was not in Cambodia on Christmas Eve, but relatively insignificant.

The truth may never come to light.

As far as Vietnam goes, Kerry does have one advantage over Bush—he was there.

Bush was serving in the National Guard, although that record also has been called into question, since, as Fox News reports, "There are lingering questions about whether Bush reported for National Guard duty over a three-month period in 1972."

We may never know the truth about either man's record, but the news media have acted as if this is the decisive factor in each candidate's platform.

In the meantime, let's not base too much on Kerry's record in Vietnam, even if he has focused his campaign on the disputing war record. That does not necessarily make him the best candidate.

Bush has no claim to being a war hero, but the allegations that he went AWOL, if true, may mean that he was an irresponsible young man, but don't necessarily reflect anything about his character now.

This election is not about Vietnam. It is about America and the world of the last four years, the next four years, and beyond.

The questions we should be asking have to do with Iraq, the economy, energy, gay rights and other issues for which the next president will help determine policy.

Instead of focusing on questionable service records, let's focus on the candidates' records in office and on their plans for the future.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Latino immigrants' treatment violates rights

Editor,

What does Jonas Hogg mean by the expressions "legitimate business" and "100 percent Americans"? (Collegian August 23).

When our government leaders, including people like Hogg, use the word "America," they usually are thinking or dreaming in the entire continent from Alaska to the Tierra del Fuego. That is why it is understandable that a number of Latino immigrants who are not American citizens, and maybe some undocumented, enlisted in the U.S. Army to fight the "war on terrorism" in Iraq.

These immigrants may not be "100 percent Americans" and may not be serving food in a Mexican restaurant, but no one is questioning their commitment to the "war business" to defend the security of the United States or reproaching them as "illegal" and that we "don't want them."

To be fair, however, if by "America" Hogg and our leaders mean only the territory of the United States, then how do you explain the structural hypocrisy of a society that tolerates the "war business" of Latinos as legitimate while condemns their "economic business" as illegitimate?

Don't get me wrong. I do not subscribe to such hypocrisy by accident. I, too, like you, take a great pleasure in proclaiming "the rule of law" aloud in this nation. But I am not naive enough to ignore its human-made sources. I don't think that our immigration legislation is determined by a moral consensus or the common interests of our entire society. It is rather the power of certain groups determined to use the law to advance their own interests and impose their moral preferences on others.

And that's why, to me, the question of the undocumented immigrants in the United States is more an issue of human rights than legality versus illegality.

PERSPECTIVES

SafeRides not enough to address students' needs

THE CHRONICLE (DUKE U.)

DURHAM, N.C. - Need for Duke University's SafeRides service has outgrown the program's original stated purpose, as more students are seeking rides when they feel unsafe and the vans cannot keep up with demand. Duke needs a transportation service that is entirely dedicated to ensuring students' safety.

"Take the bus" - that's the response that students - be they drunken freshmen on West Campus or lone female undergrads in a dim nook of Central - get all too often on the other end of a call to 684-SAFE.

SafeRides, the supplemental van service meant to work in tandem with campus buses, has been stretched thin for far too long now, and students on Duke's sprawling campus are justly complaining at nearly every turned down pick-up request.

Yet, the real problem with SafeRides may not be in its operation, but in its foundations. The program has existed as merely a supplemental service for campus buses that often take a while to arrive and don't run all night. With the way the Duke campus is laid out and reports of muggings and sexual assaults continue to pop up, someone needs to put some money into creating a transportation system exclusively for safety purposes.

The concurrence of the recent rise in student complaints about SafeRides and the merger between the transit systems of the Medical Center and Duke University last year is no coincidence. Picking up employees from work is a wholly different practice from stopping to make sure a woman isn't walking back to her dorm room halfway across campus alone.

Officials say their drivers are not trained safety professionals and are not instructed to travel off-campus except when under contract with the Duke Medical Center. But those officials should consider that in a safety-oriented service, drivers might have the extra training and ability to travel where students need to go.

With hordes of commuting Duke Medical Center employees and lonely, rideless students jamming phone lines with around 300 calls a night, the SafeRides service is understandably taking on a hefty load. But especially given growing safety concerns stemming from several reports of on-campus crimes in the past year, it's about time SafeRides expanded its forces.

Transportation officials frustrated with having to send out their own supervisors to drive a fourth van on especially busy nights are working within a budget that has undergone little to no change since the inception of SafeRides about 10 years ago.

It is imperative and practical, then, that SafeRides receive the necessary funding to purchase new vans and increase its driving and dispatch staff. It would not be asking too much for students to pay an extra required fee to improve the service - campus safety has become too much of a priority at Duke for anyone to complain about that.

Until Duke University can separate and/or expand SafeRides, the service needs to make good on the improvements that were conceived this summer. Cutting down on response time, encouraging dispatchers to be more polite and extending bus service to 4 a.m. Thursday nights are all obvious but important suggestions that need immediate execution. But for a transportation service that is does not meet current safety needs, there are more deep-seated things to consider.

Sports figures unwise to risk careers for affairs

Another one bites the dust.

Former Connecticut assistant basketball coach Clyde Vaughan resigned Wednesday following his arrest for offering to pay an undercover female police officer for oral sex.

Vaughan is added to a long list of athletes and coaches who have willingly traded in years of work and success for a few minutes of pleasure.

What the heck were they thinking? The list is extensive. It includes athletes such as Kobe Bryant and Eugene Robinson and coaches like Mike Price. Most of them attained at least some level of success and fame.

They all had careers, and most had families. They all had reputations, some better than others.

And they all took the risk of throwing it all away for a little satisfaction.

We all know about Bryant's escapades that fateful night in Colorado. He's on trial for sexual assault of a 19-year-old.

Exhibit number two is former Washington State and Alabama head football coach Mike Price.

Before he even coached a game for the Crimson Tide, he was dismissed for "inappropriate conduct" involving an evening at a strip club and a hefty room-service bill left by one of his female "acquaintances."

Next is the most shocking of all.

Eugene Robinson, a Pro Bowl safety for the Atlanta Falcons, was arrested the night before Super Bowl XXXIII for pulling a page out of the Clyde Vaughan book and soliciting sex from an undercover police officer.

Props to Eugene, though. He offered $40, the stingier Vaughan only $10.

Robinson's antics came as a surprise to everyone in the football world.

Here was a veteran with a Super Bowl ring who had a reputation as a squeaky-clean guy in the NFL. The morning of the incident, the deeply-religious Robinson — nicknamed "the Prophet" by teammates — received the Bart Starr Award for high moral character.

Oh, and I almost forgot one.

Anybody remember the Fiesta Bowl and a certain K-State quarterback who did a little more than just violate curfew? I won't mention any names and just leave it at that.

He's had an Ell of time since his hotel room incident (oops, I said I wouldn't mention any names).

His team lost the game, he lost his scholarship and the whole thing sure didn't raise his stock in the NFL Draft.

The saddest thing is all these guys should know better. They're all high-profile figures, and when they took the bait, they should have expected to get nabbed.

Even worse, there's no way the bait was worth what they ended up losing.

If any of them should have known better, though, it was Vaughan.

Here's a guy with a wife and custody of his eight-year-old son from a previous marriage with no prior record. Or so was thought.

Turns out, Vaughan had been up to his old tricks at least twice before. He was arrested for similar charges in Long Beach, Calif., in 1992 and Tampa, Fla., in 1999.

You wonder why you keep reading about sports figures getting in trouble over sex.

I guess, like Clyde Vaughan, they just never learn.

CFB| NCAA denies Williams eligibility, appeal not likely

The NCAA refused to reinstate Southern California All-American Mike Williams on Thursday, leaving the star wide receiver unable to rejoin the top-ranked Trojans after being shut out of the NFL draft by the courts.

The ruling came down shortly before the Trojans boarded an airplane for Baltimore. They open defense of their national championship Saturday night against Virginia Tech at FedEx Field in Landover, Md.

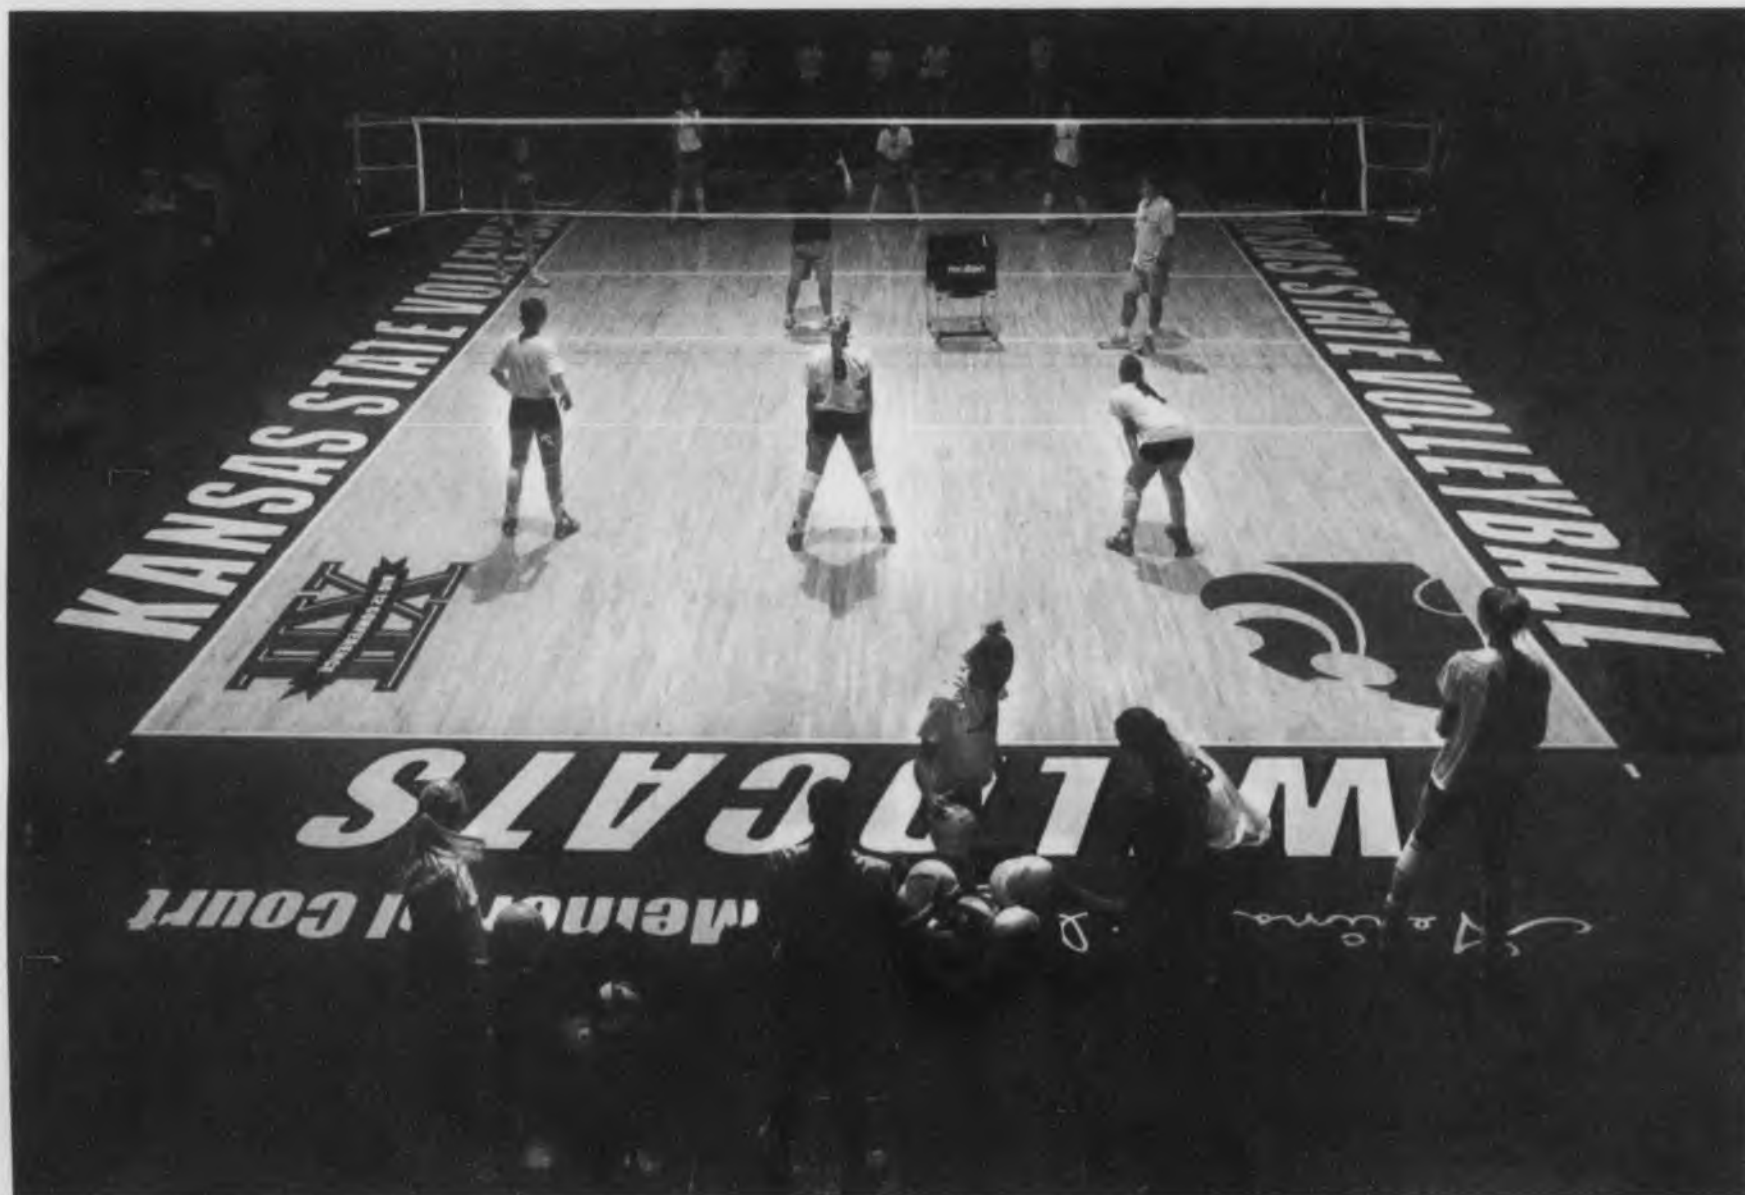

USC vice president and legal counsel Todd Dickey said while the ruling could be appealed, the matter was closed.

The school had applied to the NCAA for a progress-toward-degree waiver and reinstatement of Williams' eligibility.

After a court ruled that last winter that Ohio State's Maurice Clarett was eligible to play in the NFL, Williams left USC, hired an agent and said he was turning pro. That made him ineligible to play for the Trojans.

Williams was projected as a high first-round draft pick, but on May 24, an appeals court overturned the earlier ruling and upheld the NFL's right to bar players who had been out of high school for less than three years.

The signature — in the cursive script of a teenage girl, complete with little circles dotting each lowercase "i" — simply reads "Terina Irsik."

Taken from Irsik's social security card, it adorns the volleyball team's new Terina Irsik Memorial Court in Ahearn Field House, donated by the Kevin and Sherry Irsik family in honor of their daughter.

Terina Ann Irsik attended Ingalls (Kan.) High School where she was a middle blocker on the volleyball team, point guard on the basketball team and ran sprints and long jumped on the track team.

Also a cheerleader and active in band, the 4.0 GPA student liked math and science and had dreams of being an accountant and a lawyer so she could afford her dream car, a 1967 Corvette.

Volleyball renovations honor deceased girl with passion for sport

"She was a real best friend," said her older sister Jennifer, now the head volleyball coach for Cimarron High School. "We were only 14 1/2 months apart, so we spent all our time together. She was great."

"I couldn't have asked for a better sister."

The Irsiks were long-time K-State fans, and in the early 1990s, Terina and Jennifer attended several of the Wildcats' summer volleyball camps and developed a close relationship with Wildcat players.

Sherry Irsik said the camps had a lasting effect on her daughters.

"They always liked it, learned team ball and fundamentals," she said. "The team was important to them. They would write them letters and visit with them after games in the fall."

It was Terina's goal to play volleyball and maybe even basketball for the Wildcats, even if she had to walk on.

"It was always a dream for one of us to play there," Jennifer said. "We didn't know which one, but one of us was going to play there."

A SUDDEN, TRAGIC DEATH

One night, early in January 1994, Sherry Irsik said she thought Terina was sick following a basketball game, but didn't believe it was anything serious.

Newcomers bring talent to weeklong equestrian team tryouts

By Zachary Payne
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Things are now in full swing for the equestrian team.

The Wildcats wrap up tryouts today for the Western and English disciplines.

The week-long tryouts are being held at Fox Creek Stables outside of Manhattan, where the Wildcats will host four home events this season.

Assistant coach Meghan Cunningham said a large number of students are trying out for the team.

"There were well over 100 girls in the informational meeting, and the final number that will make the team will be 75 to 80. The results will be posted next Monday," Cunningham said.

Head coach Teresa Slough said she regrets the cuts she will have to make after tryouts.

"Some of these riders are very talented, but there are only a certain number of spots available, and that is a very hard thing to do," Slough said.

There are five levels of competition in equestrian, the first being beginner.

Freshman Jessica Spalding — the first rider to try out at the beginner level — saw the advertisement for equestrian tryouts and decided to give it a shot.

"I loved it. I've loved horses all of my life and I've never really ridden competitively before, but I saw their ad in the paper and thought I'd try it out," said Spalding.

Sophomore Kara Taddiken said she was pleased to see newcomers trying out.

"I'm excited for the young girls. I was a scared freshman last year, and the U.S. wins gold in overtime

When the final whistle blew, an exhausted Mia Hamm was quickly swarmed by 17 thrilled teammates.

A few minutes later, an Olympic gold medal was hanging around her neck, too.

Hamm and the rest of the Fab Five had just enough left in their thirty-something legs for one more title, beating Brazil 2-1 in overtime Thursday in their final tournament together.

Abby Wambach scored in the 112th minute with a powerful 10-yard header off a corner kick from Kristine Lilly. It was Wambach's fourth goal of the Olympics and 18th in her last 20 games.

Marbury, U.S. light up Spain

Larry Brown was right. The Americans did start hitting their jump shots, and suddenly they look as if they might be the team to beat at the Athens Games.

Stephon Marbury broke the U.S. men's Olympic record with 31 points, helping to beat Spain 102-94 in the quarterfinals Thursday and transform a team that had spent the first 11/2 weeks missing jumpers.

After spending 90 minutes working on his shot on the team's day off, Marbury made six of his team's 12 3-pointers and was a big reason the previously undefeated Spaniards are now out of medal contention.

Don't miss this semester's dating opportunities

As the school year begins, campus has an air of newness. There are new students to meet, new professors to learn from and new things to make fun of in the Campus Forum.

One of the most exciting things about all this newness is the possibility for romance.

New classes bring new faces and new guys for me to flirt with in class.

New roommates bring a new circle of guy friends for me to flirt with at home.

And a new freshman class brings a new crop of guys for me to, well, stare at from afar.

I'm flirty, but robbing the cradle isn't really my style.

As I contemplate all the opportunities, I am reminded of the old saying, "out with the old, in with the new."

While usually reserved for spring cleaning or the start of a new year, I think the saying can just as well be applied to a new school year.

It's a new semester. Time to toss out anything that can slow you down in your quest for some college romance.

Sick of your old boyfriend/girlfriend? That's OK; there's a ton of fish out in this big K-State sea. Just remember to end your old relationship (nicely) before you cast your net.

Still holding on to that relationship that isn't going anywhere, or that crush that never went further than "what's up?" Don't waste time with something that's going nowhere — time to move on and toss 'em out with last weekend's beer bottles.

The dating world is a fast-paced one. If you're looking to make a love connection, you need to be at the top of your game without any excess baggage weighing you down.

In with the new doesn't have to refer to just new people — there are new habits to think of as well.

Does your flirting style still consist of having your friend ask their friend if your crush likes you? Time to revamp that style — get some game going for you.

Learn how to bat those flirty eyelashes and make those pick up lines flow like honey. Trust me, learning how to make it from stuttering out "Uh ... so, umm ... what's your sign?" to smoothly saying "So, what kind of drink can I get you?" is a lesson worth learning.

And how about phone usage? Constantly sitting around and sighing because the hot guy/girl you met at a party hasn't called you? Worrying that he didn't like you enough to call? Screw that. Quit your moping and pick up the damn phone.

It might be a nice change of pace for you to take charge and make that phone call happen instead of waiting around for it.

And if they don't call, answer or return your voicemail, it's healthy to not dwell and move on.

No matter what year you are in school, college is going to go by fast. You don't want to look back and remember all of the people you didn't get with.

Here's to a new year of new.

Exorcist: 2nd time a flop

Prequel lacks psychological tension

"Exorcist: The Beginning"

★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Movie review by Corbin H. Crable

Even before its release, "Exorcist: The Beginning" was doomed to fail.

The movie's first director quit shortly after being hired. He died a month later.

Screenwriter Paul Schrader was axed after producers determined his script wasn't bloody enough.

Somehow, William Friedkin, director of the 1973 original, approved of the new script after Schrader left, and 90 percent of the movie was reshot.

With so much work, there so little to love about the result.

In director Renny Harlin's prequel to the horror classic, Father Merrin (Stellan Skarsgard) travels to Africa in the late 1940s to investigate a buried temple and instances of strange behavior among some villagers.

In Africa, Merrin does battle with the devil Pazuzu, whose unseen acts are tearing the village apart. Merrin, of course, will do battle with Pazuzu two decades later.

The story isn't as much about Merrin trying to make sense of and fight the evil around him as it is about Merrin trying to rediscover his faith.

Merrin is plagued by dreams of his experiences with Nazis in World War II-era Europe, and those experiences have led to the gradual breakdown of his religious beliefs.

Merrin's experiences with the devil and his experiences at the hands of the Nazis are tragically linked, and in both he feels helpless to assist those around him.

Sadly, Merrin is the only character who has any depth in this film. The rest, including his love interest (Izabella Scorupco), are mostly two-dimensional characters.

Besides Merrin's fall from grace, there are subtle references to the original, both visually and in the storyline, but these are not enough to carry the film for those familiar with the classic.

The action in the movie, meanwhile, takes away from the psychological excitement in the original. CGI effects have cheapened the movie's legacy.

The appeal of the original "Exorcist" was due largely in part to the tension between Merrin, Father Karras and the demon inside Regan McNeil.

The effects in the prequel are present because there is a lack of anything truly frightening. Harlin has gone for straight shock value, albeit grossly ineffective shock value.

Images such as a stillborn baby covered in maggots and crows feasting on the entrails of a dead man elicit nothing but a cringe out of disgust. Basically, all the movie lacks is a character jumping out of the shadows, saying "boo" every once in a while.

Original 'Exorcist' boils with fright

"The Exorcist"

★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Movie review by Corbin H. Crable

In horror films, the battle between good and evil often takes place in the unlikelyst of places.

In the case of 1973's "The Exorcist," the battle takes place inside a child.

Director William Friedkin's movie about demonic exorcism pits Fathers William Merrin (Max Von Sydow) and Damien Karras (Jason Miller) against a demon who possesses 11-year-old Regan McNeil (Linda Blair).

The movie is full of psychological thrills that make it just as intriguing as the familiar images with which modern moviegoers associate the film such as pea green soup, 360-degree head rotations and, in the 2000 theatrical rerelease, the horrifically creepy spider-walk scene. Chilling lines, such as Regan's statement to Father Karras that his recently deceased mother is in hell, make the movie even scarier.

"The Exorcist" is even more frightening because it was inspired by an exorcism that took place on a small boy in the late 1940s. That link to real life makes us realize that although we are watching fiction, the concept upon which the film is based is very real for some people. It all depends on one's beliefs.

The original "Exorcist" remains a model to which truly good horror movies should aspire and remains the scariest movie of all time more than 30 years later.

The prequel, "Exorcist: The Beginning," released this summer, was made solely because of the success of the original's rerelease four years ago. That alone is a testament to the film and its well-deserved place in the annals of horror movie history.

Izabella Scorupco stars in "Exorcist: The Beginning," a prequel to the 1973 original. The movie grossed more than $18 million during its opening weekend.

Freshmen face weight gain

Healthful diet, regular exercise can help curb added pounds

By Jessica Ballard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The freshman 15 is an ominous threat in the lives of many, but it is certainly not avoidable. The cause of this trend seems to be the changes associated with being a college freshman, said Dianna Schalles, registered dietitian and health educator.

"College is a huge transition time," she said. "Students are gaining more control over life's choices and dealing with newfound freedom."

This newfound freedom can mean eating more fast food, exercising less and consuming alcohol.

These unhealthy choices may be the culprits in freshman weight gain, said Julie Gibbs, fitness consultant at the Wellness Center.

Tiffany Gehlen, fitness consultant at the Wellness Center, said Housing and Dining Services offers a lot of healthy foods, but students often opt for the unhealthy choices.

"Freshmen aren't experienced with getting themselves

Tips for Avoiding the freshman 15

- To avoid the stress of trying to achieve a beach body for spring break, Schalles, Gehlen and Gibbs offer some recommendations for sparing the freshman 15.
1. Exercise your body, not just your brain.
 2. Nutrition 101. If you don't have time for whole grains, fruits and veggies, take a nutritious snack in your bag.
 3. Intelligent study snacks.
 4. Don't get too juicy. Juice seems healthy, but more than 4-6 oz. per day is not really necessary.
 5. Moderation.
 6. No skipping meals.
 7. Plan meals ahead.
 8. Have fun.

concerned with your weight. "Don't freak out," she said. She said when those few extra pounds arrive, the best thing to do is simply reassess your exercise and eating habits and make small changes towards improvement.

Gibbs said weight gain can bring about a lot more problems when people begin to "take matters into their own hands."

She said students should avoid using fad diets, diet pills, or smoking to control their weight, which can complicate things further.

Bill allocates leadership, housing funds

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

President Bush signed a bill Aug. 5 that allocates $1 million to Fort Leavenworth for a leadership program with K-State.

Charles Reagan, associate to President Jon Wefald, said the funding will be split into two parts.

"One is a faculty development program for the faculty in Fort Leavenworth," he said. "The other part will go to develop a masters in strategic studies and leadership."

Fort Leavenworth officials were not available for comment.

Reagan said the two programs do not yet have a budget.

"The budget doesn't begin until Oct. 1, and then we will have to wait and see when we contact the Defense Department and find out the rules and requirements," he said. "We are still at the very earliest stages of planning."

The bill also included $122.6 million for various projects in Fort Riley.

Sam Robinson, Fort Riley public affairs officer, said $33

MEMORIAL | Donations keep girl's memory alive

school but in the afternoon she was giggling and talking to friends on the phone," her mother said.

By 3:30 the next morning, Terina was dead. It was Jan. 6, 1994. Terina was 16 years old.

The autopsy showed the cause of death was a form of Neisseria Meningitis that was rare and, in Terina's case, fatal.

"Here was this healthy kid, and we didn't know why she died," Sherry Irsik said. "She had been kind of run down, but the doctor said everything had to be perfect (for the disease to cause death)."

"(The infection) never did get to her brain; it moved so fast in her blood stream. There was no way to save her."

REMEMBERING TERINA

After her death, the Irsiks decided they wanted to do something in her memory for K-State.

Director for Development Ernie Barrett told them of needs in the volleyball department, and the Irsiks made a contribution for the renovation of the locker rooms and offices.

"When this office was renovated almost 10 years ago, after Terina's death, the Irsiks were the biggest contributors to this office project," volleyball coach Suzie Fritz said. "They've always kind of had a place in their heart for volleyball here at K-State, and so they were very involved in this project."

Ten years later, with the team in need of a new court in Ahearn Field House, the Irsiks made another generous contribution in support of Wildcat volleyball.

"I had shared with them that we were looking at getting a new court, and the Irsiks actually went to (athletics director) Tim Weiser with an interest in doing something for volleyball, and they worked together to make it happen," Fritz said.

Sherry Irsik said it made perfect sense to donate the floor.

"The kids had had great times at Ahearn watching basketball games and it's such a good place to play volleyball - just look at their home record," she said.

The Irsiks hope the court, complete with Terina's signature - serves as a reminder of a talented, ambitious young woman who loved life and sports, especially K-State volleyball.

"I think she'd be happy with it," Sherry Irsik said.

older girls took me under their wing," Taddiken said. "I look forward to returning the favor."

Taddiken said trying out again was difficult.

"Once I was in the arena and Slough was watching me, I got really tense and had a hard time trying to relax," Taddiken said.

The tryout process is much different this season with Slough returning to the program, replacing departed head coach Lindsay Breidenthal.

Slough coached the K-State equestrian program during the 2000 inaugural season.

Cunningham taught the English discipline last season and did not require her returning riders to try out again.

However, all the Western riders, regardless of standing last season, are required to try out since Slough has never seen them ride.

Slough said she has been impressed with the quality of riders vying for positions thus far.

"About twenty girls have tried out for open, and they have all been very good riders," Slough said.

One of those students, sophomore Nicole Ruff, said she is pleased with how Slough has been leading the team.

"Teresa is taking over the head coaching position very nicely, and things are running smoothly," Ruff said.

Ruff said she has seen positive team progress.

"I tried out Monday and saw a lot of great returners and also a lot of strong, new riders who will make a great addition to the group," Ruff said.

"I am looking forward to having a strong season because things are looking promising."

The equestrian team will host their first home event, the K-State Western Show, on October 9-10.

Program fosters friendship

International Buddies Program pairs American, foreign students in effort to encourage learning

By Karthik Reddy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

International students have the opportunity to make a new friend on campus.

Now in its third year, the International Buddies Program, sponsored by the Office of International Programs, is open to all international students.

The program assigns international students to buddies, usually American students on campus. The international students can then turn to their buddies for help with any problems they might be facing or to just get a better insight into the American way of life.

"Having been an international student myself while in Spain, I know personally that it is comforting to have someone to talk to and to show you around."

The International Buddies Program is perfect for that," said Joni Redmond, a peer group adviser.

The program presents a perfect platform for students to interact with one another and also can serve as the starting point for some great camaraderie, Redmond said.

Mary Beth Cook, program coordinator, said it is aimed at bringing together the diversity that exists on campus and to foster friendships between the growing international community of students on campus and their hosts.

"The International Buddies Program is a program to help international students feel more welcome and comfortable at K-State. It also gives American students an opportunity to interact with people from around the world," she said.

Mostly designed to accommodate exchange students from around the world, the International Buddies Program is open to all international students who would like to meet new people and get help with any problems.

The buddies are assigned in a random fashion, or in some instances paired with a student with a common background.

The program helps international students feel they are a part of the K-State community and opens up a great window of opportunity to know more about the K-State culture, said Olivia Law, student assistant of the Office of International Programs.

"I think this program opens up the minds of everyone involved to other cultures, opinions and ways of life," said Law.

Judge strikes down abortion ban

By Larry Neumeister
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — In a highly anticipated ruling, a federal judge found the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act unconstitutional Thursday because it does not include a health exception.

U.S. District Judge Richard C. Casey in Manhattan said the Supreme Court has made it clear that a law that prohibits the performance of a particular abortion procedure must include an exception to preserve a woman's life and health.

Casey issued the ruling two months after hearing closing arguments in the case.

A San Francisco judge already has declared the 2003 law unconstitutional, and a judge in Lincoln, Neb., is considering the question. The three judges suspended the ban while they held the trials.

The law, signed in November, represented the first substantial federal legislation limiting a woman's right to choose an abortion. Abortion rights activists said it conflicted with three decades of Supreme Court precedent.

It banned a procedure is known to doctors as intact dilation and extraction, but is called "partial-birth abortion" by abortion foes. During the procedure, the fetus is partially removed from the womb, and its skull is punctured or crushed.

The judge challenged the conclusion by Congress that there is no significant body of medical opinion that the procedure has safety advantages for women.

Casey said the congressional record itself undermined the finding because it included contradictory views, including nine medical associations which opposed the act because they believed the abortion procedure provides safety advantages for some women.

In the San Francisco ruling, issued June 1, U.S. District Judge said the act places an undue burden on a woman's right to choose.

Sebelius shuffles Cabinet for proposals

By John Hanna
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Gov. Kathleen Sebelius announced Thursday that she is shuffling her Cabinet as her administration works on proposals to increase education spending and tackle rising health care costs.

Lt. Gov. John Moore plans to step down as secretary of commerce next Wednesday. Sebelius said Moore will become heavily involved in education and health care policy, though his exact role hasn't been defined.

Secretary of Administration Howard Fricke will take over for Moore at the Department of Commerce.

State Budget Director Duane Goossen will become secretary of administration while still keeping the budget director's responsibilities.

"We really needed to realign the talent," Sebelius said during a news conference. "What we're doing, really, is sort of reassigning talent."

C.J. Anderson, Manhattan resident, looks at necklaces Thursday afternoon after finding a ring she will purchase at Krystallos.

stores," Rose said. "We're hoping the customers that we had in Aggieville will come downtown."

Julie Strecker, owner of Geometrics and the current landlord for Krystallos, said she thought the store would benefit the downtown area. Geometrics occupied two storefronts before Strecker began renting one to Krystallos.

"It's a great addition to downtown, and it's a great addition to my store. I bring them some new customers, and they bring me some new customers," Strecker said.

The rebuilding process was more extensive than Rose expected, she said.

"We didn't have a pen or a paperclip," Rose said. "We had to start from the very beginning. It took a lot of work. It was quite an undertaking."

Krystallos' clientele includes both K-State students and Manhattan residents, Rose said.

Following the reopening in early August, Rose said the change of venue has not affected business negatively, which she attributes to her loyal customer base.

Amber Crawshaw, a 2004 graduate, said she was a regular customer of Krystallos throughout her time as a K-State student. She helped with the remodeling of the downtown location and is also an employee.

What: Retail store that specializes in Sterling silver jewelry

Hours:
Monday through Saturday: 10 a.m.-6 p.m.
Sundays: Noon - 5 p.m.
Open until 8 p.m. Thursdays

Where: 405 Poyntz Ave.

"I see this whole thing as a blessing in disguise," Crawshaw said.

"If it hadn't burned down, we wouldn't have moved downtown and got this space."

Crawshaw said she was attracted to Krystallos because the merchandise is unique.

"It was always bad for me to come in, and it's bad for me to work here, because I always find something I want," she said. "There's a selection of unique pieces of jewelry. It's much more fun to shop here. Everything is hand-picked."

The new building is three times as large as the Aggieville location, which allows the store to sell a wider selection of products, Rose said.

"We still have a large selection of Sterling silver and gemstone jewelry, which is what we specialize in," Rose said.

"We have hundreds of rings, a wide variety of clothing, gifts and accessories."

C.J. Anderson, a Manhattan resident, said she shops at Krystallos because of its jewelry selection.

"It's the only place to get actual nice jewelry," Anderson said.

DOWNTOWN'S "RENAISSANCE"

Strecker, who opened Geometrics in 1998, said when Manhattan Town Center opened, locally owned businesses suffered at the expense of its success. However, 17 years later, she said the area is moving in the right direction.

"It's changed a lot. Sometimes we take two steps forward and one step back," Strecker said. "There are a lot more boutiques downtown, and I think that's what downtowns are made for."

Rose said she saw downtown growing, too, and was glad to see the changing atmosphere of the area.

"It's become a place for people to come shop and not just go to one place. They can go to several," Rose said.

"There are beautiful old buildings, and there's a lot of historical preservation. I see downtown Manhattan coming alive again."

Strecker said there is still room for growth downtown, but the area and the businesses are moving in the right direction.

"They all add something. We have a ways to go, but there are a lot of different businesses down here," she said.

"Things are happening downtown. The renaissance is here."

BOOKS | More students buying class texts online

Sarah Erdner, freshman in open-option, was among the many students returning their books this week.

Because of scheduling conflicts, Erdner was forced to drop her psychology class and was able to return her textbooks at no monetary loss, she said.

Union Bookstore Manager Steve Levin said bookstore operators have seen an increase in the number of books returned in comparison to previous years.

"I think with the tuition increase, students may have been more cautious this year, only buying books they absolutely need," Levin said.

One of the main reasons behind this sudden decrease in demand may be that students are finding alternate suppliers who are offering texts at reduced prices.

Many students are now using the Internet to find cheaper books.

Sarah Olson, sophomore in accounting, used Amazon.com and Half.com to purchase two textbooks.

The books were sent in time and Olson was able to return the textbooks she purchased from the Union before the Friday deadline.

"I'd recommend other students order online as well," she said.

Even with shipping, she said she was able to save about $70.

The best time to exchange books, Walter said, is in the morning. It also helps if the books are returned to the store where they were purchased.

Packets of books shrink-wrapped with other items must be returned in their entirety in order to be refunded.

Also, according to store policy credit card purchases can only be credited back to the purchasing account.

To ensure a full refund, a receipt is required.

"Folks can fax the receipt to you, even a copy of the receipt just so we know how and when the purchase was made," Walter said.

Students can return textbooks to the Union Bookstore until 8 p.m. or Varney's Book Store until 9 p.m.

"We're happy to provide books for the campus. If a student has a problem with their texts, we're always here to help them," Levin said. "We want you to have the books you need."

IRAQ | Government hopeful for successful peace talks

U.S. military would accept the provisions on the agreement calling on its forces to leave Najaf.

Al-Sistani aide Hamed al-Khafaf announced al-Sadr's acceptance and suggested fighters from his Mahdi Army militia would leave the Imam Ali Shrine, the holy site they have used as a stronghold and refuge throughout the fighting.

"There will be a mechanism that will preserve the dignity of everyone in getting out of the holy shrine, and you'll see this in the coming hours," al-Khafaf told Al-Jazeera television.

The shrine, in Najaf's Old City, has been the center of fighting, and U.S. troops have tried to avoid damaging it, fearing it would anger Shiites.

Al-Sistani's immense moral authority brings more hope for this peace plans than previous ones.

Al-Sistani, the most senior of four clerics in Iraq holding the rank of grand ayatollah, is one of the most respected men in the country, esteemed by Iraqis of all religious factions. He is more popular among Iraqi Shiites than al-Sadr, who is in his early 30s and of a far lower clerical rank.

Al-Sadr's fiery anti-U.S. message has drawn many poorer, disillusioned Shiites but he is seen by the Shiite mainstream as impulsive and too radical.

Local gas prices avoid surge from rising oil costs

By Joanna Rubick
 KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Crude oil prices skyrocketed in recent weeks, reaching an all-time high of $49.25 per barrel, but gas prices have stayed fairly constant.

One of the possible reasons is gas stations did not buy gas during the rise in prices, said Jeff Rosell, petroleum manager for Farmer's Co-op Association.

"Most stations get one load of fuel every week, so they will get the gas prices then," he said. "If it would have hit $50, then I think prices would have been affected."

Fighting in the Middle East has much to do with crude oil prices, causing the prices to fall some the past week, Rosell said.

"With everything calming down, fuel started coming on down this week," he said.

Retailers still try to keep prices as low as they can.

"When fuel goes high, typically retailers will be making less money than if the prices are low," Rosell said.

Gas stations will make a smaller margin when gas prices are higher than lower, because they try to stay competitive.

"I think the local retailers would like to keep fuel below $2," he said. "It's to everybody's advantage for oil prices to be low."

However, we won't see low prices again for any extended period of time, said Lloyd Thomas, head of the Department of Economics.

"World demand has increased because of increased demand by China and India, as well as the U.S.," Thomas said. "There is little spare world capacity."

Economies in countries like China and India have grown very rapidly, causing the demand for oil to increase, but there wasn't enough investment in the oil industry to raise the supply, he said.

"One of the problems is the U.S. isn't serious about conservation. The U.S. is acting like there's an infinite amount of oil," Thomas said.

"We're not dealing with the problems," he said.

Thomas said gas alternatives such as Ethanol are overrated, so energy conservation should be stressed.

"We need to give signals to people to start buying cars that get better gas mileage," Thomas said.

"We need to work towards conserving energy and give big incentives towards creating new technology," he said.

Protesters march on site of GOP convention

By Tom Raum
 THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Tens of thousands of demonstrators marched on Sunday past Madison Square Garden, site of the Republican National Convention, chanting, blowing whistles and carrying anti-war banners as delegates gathered to nominate President Bush for a second term.

On the eve of the convention, the demonstrators packed the street from sidewalk to sidewalk for 20 blocks as they slowly filed past.

"Hope is in the air, help is on the way," civil rights leader Jesse Jackson said through a bullhorn.

On the other side of New York Harbor, Vice President Dick Cheney told a rally on Ellis Island that Bush was "exactly the leader we need for these times, and we need him for the next four years."

With the New York skyline as the background, Cheney said it was "a special honor to kick things off here on this island, the gateway to America for so many people."

Meanwhile, Bush suggested in an interview with Time magazine that he still would have gone into Iraq but with different tactics if he had known "that an enemy that should have surrendered or been done in escaped and lived to fight another day."

He called the swift military

An eclectic mix of soccer and rugby was played Sunday afternoon at Memorial Stadium. The ball, however, was six feet in diameter, inflatable and pushed around by 13 fraternities and eight sororities.

The game was Earthball, a fund-raiser for the Manhattan Head Start Program, sponsored by Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority and Delta Chi fraternity.

Erin Leonard, senior in speech pathology and president of Kappa Kappa Gamma, said the game has been in existence for at least five years.

"The last time we did this, the money we raised bought books for the library, something that was really in need of funding," Leonard said.

The event was previously in the spring, but after numerous rain-out dates, it was moved to the fall, Leonard said.

"I think we might keep it in the fall," Leonard said.

Study shows wheat helps fight illness

New K-State research shows that adding wheat to your diet can help prevent cancer.

In a collaborative study at K-State and Wichita State University, findings suggest that some components of wheat might be helpful in preventing colorectal cancer.

Colorectal cancer, the third most common cancer in both men and women, includes cancers of the rectum, colon, appendix and anus, according to the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

The new research shows that orthophenols, chemical components found in wheat, act as antioxidants to kill cancer cells.

John Carter, associate professor in the college of health professionals, was involved with the study on the WSU side.

"We used a mouse model, named Min Mouse, that has been used as an animal model for colon cancer since 1990," Carter said. "The mouse develops tumors in its intestines instantaneously."

WORLD IN REVIEW: 7 THINGS YOU DIDN'T KNOW 7 DAYS AGO

Peace in Najaf

An Iraqi Shi'ite man cries against the wall of Najaf's Imam Ali shrine August 27, 2004, next to a poster of cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. Some have shed their black combat gear for civilian clothes and are ready to go back to their jobs, but the Shi'ite militants who say they will respect a peace deal in Najaf are already primed for the next battle.

Staff and wire reports

After three weeks of fighting, Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr ordered his militia in Najaf, Iraq, to stand down.

Al-Sadr brokered a peace deal with the Iraqi government Thursday, and a relatively quiet period has followed. However, fighting near Baghdad has remained intense.

Under the deal, Najaf is a weapons-free city and all foreign forces must withdraw from Najaf.

GUANTANAMO HEARINGS BEGIN

One man admitted guilt to al-Qaeda ties, while another pleaded innocent to war crimes charges.

The U.S. government has been holding the people for more than a year but had not charged any of them until the Supreme Court ordered it to do so or release the prisoners.

NEW DEAL

Gov. Kathleen Sebelius took steps Thursday she said would increase education spending and tackle rising health care costs.

The cabinet shuffle moves Lt. Gov. John Moore from secretary of commerce and makes him more involved in education and health care policy.

Other officials also will change responsibilities to support the administration's focus.

JUDGE RULES AGAINST BAN

Two judges deemed the partial-birth abortion ban unconstitutional because it does not contain an exception for the mother's health.

Judges in New York and San Francisco declared the 2003 law unconstitutional, and another judge in Nebraska is considering the question.

CONVENTION PREPARATIONS

Security in New York has been tightened in preparation for this week's Republican National Convention.

Police arrested several bicycle protesters already for staging a coordinated ride through the streets.

Police said the cyclists were causing disturbances.

President Bush will accept the GOP's bid for a second term at the convention.

BLAME FOR ABU GHRAIB

An official report released Tuesday cited Pentagon officials as being at least partially to blame for the Abu Ghraib prison scandal. The report said leaders did not establish clear guidelines for interrogation techniques.

It also was announced on Wednesday that 27 people from an intelligence unit at the prison may face disciplinary action for misconduct.

EXECUTIVE ORDER

President Bush used executive order Friday to change the role of the CIA director until more long-term, official changes can be instituted.

Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., chair of the Senate Intelligence Committee, had come under fire last week for suggesting the rearrangement of the CIA.

The moves were in response to the 9-11 Commission's report that called for a re-structuring of the nation's intelligence community.

Course material options expand

Copy centers, Web sites provide cheaper options

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some teachers just pass out their syllabi in class, but there are other options.

Campus copy centers print off the syllabi for some courses.

Donna Crawshaw, supervisor of the College of Arts and Science's Copy Center, said students will pay a small fee for their syllabi if they have to pick it up at a copy center.

"A lot of students will come here and buy it because it is probably cheaper to buy it, here if it's available than to print it off the Internet and use their ink," Crawshaw said.

Several teachers also have their syllabi and other coursework available at K-State Online.

■ Some classes offer message boards, course work and a gradebook.

Robert Smith, graduate teaching assistant, said he gives out a hard copy of the syllabus as well as offering it on K-State Online.

"One of the main reasons I offer it online is because it allows me the opportunity to make minor changes if I get behind," he said.

Smith said having the syllabus online is also convenient for the students.

"I understand that some students will lose it," he said. "It prevents me from having to make a bunch of extra copies."

Mary McGivern, sophomore in psychology, said she likes having the syllabus available online.

"I prefer it online because I always lose them," she said. "I always know where it's at."

Nicolas Wilson, senior in computer science, disagreed.

"I'd rather them just give it to me," he said.

"I don't want to have to print it out, and I don't like walking to the copy center."

Smith said more and more professors are offering their syllabus online.

"There may come a day when instructors will have it exclusively online, but I don't think that will happen for a long time," he said.

U.S., al-Sadr officials enter into peace talks

By Todd Pitman
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — U.S. military officials and representatives of rebel Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr held talks Sunday aimed at reducing violence in the restive Baghdad slum of Sadr City, a day after clashes there killed 10 people, officials said.

British forces in the southern city of Basra, also the site of recent fighting, held similar talks with al-Sadr officials there.

Both areas had erupted in violence after U.S. forces and al-Sadr's militants began fighting in the holy city of Najaf three weeks ago, and the talks Sunday appeared to be an effort by both sides to expand on the peace deal that ended the Najaf crisis Friday.

An agreement, at least in Sadr City, remained elusive, however, with al-Sadr's aides demanding a U.S. pullout from the neighborhood, a condition U.S. officials rejected.

Meanwhile, guerrillas launched an attack on the country's oil infrastructure in the south, blowing up several oil export pipelines and cutting already curtailed exports to about 500,000 barrels a day, an oil official said.

In the north, insurgents ambushed U.S. troops with rocket-propelled grenades near Mosul, sparking gunbattles that killed two attackers and wounded 34 civilians, the U.S. military said.

U.S. forces and al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia have been fighting for weeks in Sadr city, the east Baghdad slum named for the rebel cleric's father. Though peace descended on Najaf on Friday, skirmishes continued Saturday in Baghdad, with militants firing mortars and automatic weapons at U.S. troops and tanks in the impoverished neighborhood.

In response, al-Sadr representatives, tribal leaders, Shiite politicians, government officials and U.S. military officers met to discuss the violence.

The head of the tribal negotiating team, Naim al-Bakhati, told reporters that all sides — including al-Sadr representatives — had agreed that damaged areas there be rebuilt, U.S. troops withdraw from the area except for their normal patrols and that Iraqi police be allowed to enter the slum.

But "there was no agreement on the Mahdi Army handing over their weapons," al-Bakhati said.

Sadr City police chief Col. Maarouf Moussa Omran said all sides agreed to observe a one-day truce until Monday morning to give the Iraqi government time to discuss the results of the meeting.

But Lt. Col. Jim Hutton, a spokesman for the U.S. Army's 1st Cavalry Division, said "there has been no agreement of any kind," adding that the talks were not negotiations.

Sadr City remained relatively peaceful Sunday. Fighting Saturday in the slum killed 10 people and wounded 126, said Saad al-Amili, a Health Ministry official.

In Basra, a British commander held talks with al-Sadr's top representative in the city, Sheikh Asaad al-Basri, and the pro-al-Sadr deputy governor, Salam al-Malliki.

British Maj. Charlie Mayo, a coalition spokesman in Basra, described the meeting as a routure "interaction between the local British commanders and respected tribal leaders."

Before the talks started, al-Basri told the Associated Press that "we want to avoid bloodshed but we have conditions that we will put forward to the British" including an amnesty for Mahdi Army members and compensation for victims of recent clashes.

Al-Basri also said he wanted British forces to keep out of the city center and use mutually agreed roads to reach their bases around the city.

The latest attack on Iraq's vulnerable oil infrastructure occurred Sunday when assailants blew up several export pipelines in al-Radgha, 30 miles southwest of Basra, an official at the state-run South Oil Co. said on condition of anonymity.

Plumes of black smoke billowed from the area as firefighters struggled to extinguish the flames. The pipelines connect the Rumaila oilfields with export storage tanks in the Faw peninsula.

Iraq exports about 90 percent of its oil out of the south and sabotage last week had already halved normal exports to about 900,000 barrels a day. Sunday's attack cut exports to about 500,000 barrels a day, a second official with the company said on condition of anonymity.

If the fires aren't put out soon and other sabotaged lines aren't repaired, exports could be halted entirely, the official said.

Insurgents have launched repeated attacks on Iraq's vital oil industry in a bid to damage reconstruction efforts and undermine the interim government, which relies heavily on oil income.

On Saturday, saboteurs blew up another pipeline in the West Qurna oilfields, 90 miles north of Basra.

Near the northern city of Mosul early Sunday, insurgents holed up in a mosque attacked U.S. patrols with rocket-propelled grenades twice in three hours, said Army Capt. Angela Bowman.

The violence occurred just outside Tal Afar, 30 miles west of Mosul. Soldiers returned fire during both assaults, killing two of the attackers, she said. No U.S. casualties were reported.

Scores of people in the area sleeping outdoors on rooftops to escape the summer heat were wounded "by flying debris and broken glass" during the violence, the U.S. military said in a statement.

Citing a doctor at a hospital in Tal Afar, the military said 34 civilians were wounded, 26 of them women and children. Provincial health chief Rabie Yasin al-Khalil told The Associated Press that 32 civilians were injured.

Also Sunday, French President Jacques Chirac said his country would spare no effort to free two French reporters held hostage in Iraq by militants demanding that France scrap its ban on Islamic head scarves in state schools. He dispatched his foreign minister to work for the journalists' release.

Chirac sought to appeal to the kidnappers with an implicit reminder that France opposed the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq. But he did not directly respond to their demand that the head scarf ban be overturned within 48 hours.

Shoe supplier aids local athletes in need of equipment

By Nathan Ryerson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Eddie Olson's family has been helping Manhattan athletes with foot care since 1913.

Olson Shoe and Pedorthic Services, located at 1214 Moro St., Suite B, provides custom orthotics for athletes.

"We make plaster casts of a person's foot," said Eddie Olson Sr., owner of Olson Shoes since 1963. "We match the plantar surface of the sole of a person's foot with the orthotic."

"It's a hard, rigid version of the spongy in-soles you see at drug stores."

Olson Shoes provides this service to athletes in order to prevent injury.

"The orthotics keep stress off a person's knees and keep them running and walking properly," Olson said. "An average person takes between 8,000 and 9,000 steps per day and an athlete takes, at the very least, twice as many steps."

"Usually there is more stress on an athlete's steps due to running and more strenuous activity."

According to the Pedorthic Footwear Association, foot injuries are among the most common sports injuries, because there are so many components of the foot.

"We get athletes from all different sports at K-State," Olson said. "We get athletes from football, basketball and a lot of soccer players."

"Soccer players have more stress on their knees than most other athletes out there."

"It also seems like we get more girls than guys," Olson said.

According to Olson, most athletes come in after the first couple games, when they start feeling aches and pains in their knees.

"The sports medicine doctor will normally recommend that the athlete come in and get custom orthotics to prevent future injury," Olson said.

"They will write them a doctor's note and then we see what we can do for them."

Jeff Ferguson, assistant athletic director for sports medicine at K-State, said that they are very happy working with Olson.

"They are nice folks and they are truly dedicated and truly care about their profession," he said.

TO THE POINT GOP convention protesters face too many barriers

More than 300 demonstrators were arrested in New York City before the Republican National Convention even began.

It's no secret that President Bush has enemies, but seeing them arrested while exercising their free speech rights is alarming. Imposed regulations, such as banning protesters from walking on the grass, only seems to be an unreasonable restriction to stifle unpopular opinion.

Too often during the Bush presidency it seems free speech has taken a back seat to security concerns with the Patriot Act allowing officials to detain individuals who pose any threat.

However, order and especially security are essential in a city already sensitive to threats. Protesters have an obligation to honor the First Amendment by expressing their views peacefully in order to not violate others' essential rights like security.

Republicans would be wise to ensure unfair silencing of opposition is not occurring outside the building where inside the democratic process is unfolding. Now, more than ever, all Americans must ensure the democratic process, including the free exchange of views, is allowed to flourish.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Loaded weapon

Our fabulous plutocrats in Washington have passed an appropriations bill for the Department of Defense to the tune of $416 billion. Way to go guys. Or perhaps not.

JONAS HOGG

While it seems like we're sending a fat wad the way of our military, the truth is far more detestable.

According to a recent article by the Washington Post, our politicians have served themselves a healthy portion of the pie, leaving just a bit of crust for the Department of Defense.

That's right folks, — $8.9 billion worth of frivolous spending.

However, as unforgivable as political gluttony might be, it at least would show some manner of statesmanship to fund our military reasonably.

But they bungled this critical task at a time when our resources are stretched far and wide. The funding left for wartime operations is just a small percentage of what analysts say is necessary for 2005.

All of this is done under the familiar banner of "support our troops." Sadly, this political catch phrase has become a particularly odious piece of drivel used to illicit cheap cheers at rallies.

The appropriation bill was first introduced in June by the Chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, Alaska Republican Ted Stevens, who proceeded to stuff it through the halls of the Senate in a few short hours.

By the time the bill passed the Senate, there were a whopping 42 amendments tacked on, many of them little bits of grease for the senators to rub on their constituents during the upcoming elections.

To make a bad matter worse, none of the votes on these amendments were recorded. All 42 were passed with "voice" votes, leaving the voters clueless as to who was supporting this pork-barreling.

The majority of these amendments consisted of a few million allocated for (insert frivolous waste of tax dollars here). In the end, 2,000 additional money-grabs were included in the bill.

Even the usual whistleblowers were strangely silent during this greedy rampage.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., went through all the motions of criticizing the excess.

However, when it came down to action, he chose to simply have his speech slipped into the Congressional Record rather than actually deliver it.

There seems to be an undue amount of silence concerning this act. All of the politicians will go home and tell everybody that they voted for better body-armor for our troops.

I'd imagine, though, that they will gloss over cutting $100 million from Army weapons depot maintenance funds.

They'll conveniently forget slashing $1.5 billion for transportation and consumables (meaning spare tires and food).

The $4.534 billion in reductions, buried in the back and whited-out with ass-covering double speak such as "unobligated balances."

But we shouldn't worry too much about the military running out of supplies. After all, more than half of those cuts came from military salaries and training funding.

But if anyone should be wondering to themselves "what could we possibly do with $4.534 billion dollars?" Fear not, for it's already spent.

The surplus was quickly burnt up on such fine programs as Brown Tree Snake Eradication in Hawaii, and the grant for 3 Piper aircraft and a simulator to a college in Montana, both of these part of the new Defense Appropriations Act.

By now some of you are certainly thinking, well certainly MY party fought against this.

Well, in fact, no. The Demopublicans were all seated at the table together. The bill passed 97-0.

that support consists of less pay, fewer supplies, and fewer people. Perhaps, what the really meant to say (they just forgot) is "I support myself for another term."

Apply the Golden Rule to visiting fans

Have you ever been walking down a street and seen a haggard-looking wino yelling at traffic? Lord knows I have, and I laugh every time.

And I think to myself, "jeeppers, that guy sure does love yelling at traffic — almost as much as I love K-State football!"

I'm from Manhattan, so I've been going to K-State football games for the better part of two decades. I don't mean to toot my own horn, but toot toot.

As a dedicated fan, my eyes have witnessed more than the usual allotment of fourth quarter comebacks and Weird Robert sightings (both are equally exhilarating).

I've also been to many away games, so I've had the opportunity to experience the fans from nearly every Big XII university.

Most schools treat visiting fans with, at the very least, passive tolerance.

But in my four years of going to away games, I've never been more furious than two seasons ago in Boulder, Colo.

The hostility began well before kickoff, but my fury didn't reach smoke-from-the-ears proportions until a few quarters into the game, when a Colorado student pissed in a cup and proceeded to launch it into a section full of purple.

Take a moment to digest that. After the game, my friend's mom returned to her car and — surprise! — her tires were slashed. In talking to other people who attended the game, it also was revealed that eggs were thrown and cars were keyed.

Apparently hurling a cup full of human waste wasn't sufficient enough means for Colorado fans to voice their displeasure for the visitors. They had to resort to destruction of property to really drive that point home.

I guess I shouldn't have been surprised to see such behavioral vomit spewing forth from fans of a football program famous for the fifth down, probation and rape allegations.

After that weekend in hell, I started taking notice of our own fans' behavior. Luckily, I didn't see anyone acting as primitively as the lowlifes I encountered in Boulder.

I did, however, come to the realization that we aren't exactly a bunch of saints either, and that is something we need to work on if we don't want to be lumped in with the birdbrains at CU.

This Saturday, the 2004 K-State football season kicks off against the Beluga State Snarflabatts in what is sure to be a doozy. I have a request for the students of this fair institution.

Treat the visiting team and its fans with respect. Continue to do so throughout the season. I hate to get all Danny Tanner on you, but it has to be said.

I'm not saying you have to tongue-kiss every old lady in a Nebraska sweater — that's my job. I'm just saying that we should, at the very least, conduct ourselves with the passive tolerance I mentioned above.

A simple "welcome to Manhattan" would go a long way to insure that no one calls us birdbrains in their student newspaper.

I know there will be a few jerks in the students' section who scoff at my request for harmonious footballing and continue to act like windbags.

To them I (sarcastically) say this: we're all very impressed that you can heckle Louisiana-Monroe's third string long snapper. Your barbs are both witty and creative and not annoying at all. Ever thought about doing comedy?

Again, I know most of you don't act like these dingleberries, and I'm glad. But to those of you who do, don't you care that you're warping people's perception of K-State? Don't you care that you look like a bozo?

You may not, but I do. So do like Joey Gladstone, and cut it out.

That being said, have fun this Saturday. Cheer loudly, wear a purple shirt, and treat the visitors with — at the very least — passive tolerance. We'll look a lot better if you do.

But please, for the love of all that is holy, leave the purple camo pants at home. These just make us look like weirdos.

Mr. Gay Kansas event raises AIDS awareness in area

By Patrice R. Holderbach

Fishnet hosiery wound around his legs, strings of pearls draped his neck.

An outfit made of silver sequins fitted his body, the back cut lower than the front, low enough to reveal the sparkles dabbed on his back, sparkles more subtle than the glinting light bouncing off the disco ball above.

In front of an audience of about 50 people Saturday night at Xcalibur Club in Junction City, Jim Shaffer mouthed, "I'm just a sweet transvestite," lyrics from "The Rocky Horror Picture Show."

Shaffer, dressed in full form as a drag queen, entertained the crowd at Mr. Gay Kansas Stripper 2004. That evening, Shaffer relinquished his title as Mr. Gay Kansas Stripper 2003.

The contest is a five-year tradition hosted at Xcalibur and sponsored by the Junction City Teddy Bears, a non-profit gay-men's club.

The event is a fund-raiser during which the competitors strip to see who can collect the most money from the crowd.

The money will benefit the Regional AIDS Program, which promotes AIDS education in the community and assists patients and their friends and families.

When winners were announced, organizers read only first names of contestants. The club and its patrons maintain as much confidentiality as possible, said Jeremy Casillas, Xcalibur deejay.

Casillas won third place. First place received $75, a sash and teddy bear. Second and third places also received cash prizes of $50 and $25, respectively.

"When you get up there and you show all your naughty parts to everybody, it's overwhelming," Casillas said. "And it makes you want to perform better, based on the crowd's response."

The strip contest generated $193.75 in donations to RAP. At least an additional $169 was made from bar tips, a sex toys auction and performances by Eartha Quake, a male emcee dressed as a female.

Kevin Stilley, RAP secretary said he hoped the fund-raiser would help offset a $7,000 reduction in funds that resulted after the Kansas Department of Health and Education downsized a RAP grant.

AIDS education is at the forefront of RAP's mission, Stilley said.

"Young people who are out experimenting with drugs and sex don't see the risk," Stilley said. "In the gay community, young gay people consider (AIDS) an old people's disease."

As part of the audience, Andrew Wallenberg, senior in psychology, said he came to support AIDS awareness.

"I just think it's important that students know that AIDS is out there. It affects everyone and doesn't discriminate against any group," Wallenberg said.

Sometimes, Wallenberg said, organizations have to look for nontraditional tactics to promote a cause.

"It wasn't like it was overly sexual or dirty," Wallenberg said. "It's just people dancing, taking off their clothes for a good cause."

The bottom line, he said, is recognizing AIDS as a community issue.

"Don't discriminate against people just because they have a disease," Wallenberg said. "Do unto others as you would do to yourself. The Golden Rule - it's the best way to live life."

Bombing of contractor office in Kabul kills 7

By Amir Shah
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KABUL, Afghanistan - An explosion tore through the office of an American security contractor Sunday in the heart of the Afghan capital, killing seven people, including two Americans, officials and witnesses said.

The explosion hit the office of DynCorp Inc., a U.S. firm that provides security for Afghan President Hamid Karzai and works for the U.S. government in Iraq, said Nick Downie of the Afghanistan NGO Security Office.

The explosion which occurred in front of the Kabul office of an international security company killed at least seven people," Karzai's office said in a statement. "Two Americans, three Nepalese and two Afghan nationals, including a child, have been confirmed dead."

Hours earlier, a blast at a southeastern Afghanistan school killed nine youngsters and one adult, the U.S. military said. The child victims were said to be between the ages of 7 and 15, said Paktia Gov. Asadullah Wafa. He said 15 other people were injured.

Karzai and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad expressed shock at the Kabul attack. An embassy statement described the contractor as helping train Afghan police.

The company is believed to employ

Nepalese guards in Afghanistan, where it reportedly is involved in anti-drug efforts.

"This cowardly attack will not deter U.S. participation in the ongoing effort to help Afghanistan stand on its own feet," Khalilzad said, describing the blast as a "terrorist attack."

Downie said he and others at the scene pulled five or six seriously injured people - including apparent Americans - from the building.

NATO forces patrolling Kabul have warned that anti-government militants, including the ousted Taliban, could try to mount spectacular attacks in a bid to disrupt landmark presidential elections scheduled for Oct. 9.

NCAA eligibility ruling poorly timed, illogical

Two-for-two usually isn't a bad thing. For a quarterback it could be the foundation for a scoring drive.

However, following its decision last Thursday to deny eligibility to USC wide receiver Mike Williams the NCAA is now a perfect two-for-two in screwing up.

Two days after rejecting University of Colorado wide receiver Jeremy Bloom's final appeal to play, the NCAA did the same to Williams.

For a second time, college sports' governing body has made a decision lacking common sense and caring.

In justifying its decision, the NCAA said Williams tossed away his chance to play college football again when he signed with an agent, dropped his spring classes and declared for the NFL draft.

The NCAA is trying to make this a cut-and-dry issue, but it's far from it.

JOSH WITT

Williams only did what he did because the law of the land said he could at the time.

When he made the choice to go the NFL route, it was perfectly legal.

Twice courts had ruled former Ohio State running back Maurice Clarett could declare for the draft despite not meeting the NFL's requirement of being three years removed from his senior year in high school.

Williams only two years removed from high school was following Clarett's path, and when a federal appeals court reversed the prior two rulings on May 24, the phenomenal talent was left out to dry.

Immediately, Williams dropped his agent and enrolled in summer classes in hopes of regaining his eligibility.

Maybe the NCAA would let Williams back in — it's not like he initiated the whole draft controversy.

It seemed like he was making a good-faith effort to come back.

Surprise; it didn't matter to the NCAA.

The NCAA took the same hard-line, uncompromising position it did when it denied Jeremy "I just want to ski for my country" Bloom the right to play.

At a time in which the NCAA repeatedly says it wants to emphasize student-athlete educational and personal development, here comes a guy who actually wants to come back to school.

And what does the NCAA say? Sorry, buddy.

Then there's the timing of the decision. The NCAA didn't let USC and Williams know of its choice until the day the Trojans were set to leave for their game against Virginia Tech in Maryland.

Way to be courteous, fellas.

You can't tell me it's taken this many months to make a decision that, by all accounts, the NCAA knew it was going to make from the start.

Sure, with Saturday's 24-13 win over Virginia Tech and the emergence of Reggie Bush, the Trojans showed they'll be alright without Williams.

That doesn't take away from the poor timing and logic behind the decision.

To hold out as long as they did, NCAA officials created an added distraction for the Trojans as they prepared to play their first game of the year.

USC had the talent pool to overcome the loss of a superstar, but can you imagine if Darren Sproles and K-State were the ones involved instead of Williams and the Trojans? It would've wrecked the season.

Luckily, situations like Williams' and Bloom's are rare, and hopefully we won't have to deal with them anytime soon.

The NCAA had a rare opportunity to show compassion and common sense.

The NCAA ruined its chance.

Olympics

Former priest disrupts race

A defrocked Irish priest bolted from the crowd and grabbed the marathon leader about three miles from the finish Sunday. The Brazilian runner wound up with the bronze — and a special award for sportsmanship — and the former priest was arrested.

Cornelius Horan, 57, was wearing a green beret, a red kilt and knee-high green socks when he attacked Brazilian runner Vanderlei de Lima, knocking him into the crowd. De Lima was able to recover and finish, but was passed by two runners about a mile after the incident.

The Brazilian track federation protested the result and sought a duplicate gold medal for de Lima, but while the jurors expressed sympathy, they said they couldn't change the result. Brazil said it would appeal to sports' international arbitration panel.

The International Olympic Committee said it would present de Lima with its Pierre de Coubertin medal in recognition of his "exceptional demonstration of fair play and Olympic values."

Hamm's gold still disputed

South Korea made a last-ditch push for the gymnastics gold medal given to Paul Hamm, appealing to sports' international arbitration panel to say "yes" when everyone else has said "no way."

Only hours before the Olympics ended Sunday, Yang Tae-Young asked the Court of Arbitration for Sport to order international gymnastics officials to correct the results from the all-around, and adjust the medal rankings so he gets gold and the American gets a silver.

But U.S. Olympic Committee spokesman Darryl Seibel said the appeal was a moot point. The International Gymnastics Federation, known as FIG, already said it won't change its results, and the International Olympic Committee has refused even to consider the idea of giving Yang a gold medal.

U.S. bounces back for bronze

Bronze is better than nothing. That's one Olympic lesson the U.S. men's basketball team was able to understand.

The Americans took the third-place game seriously Saturday night, earning some revenge and salvaging some self-respect in a 104-96 victory over Lithuania.

Defeating a team that beat them earlier in the tournament, the Americans got 22 points from Shawn Marion, 15 from Iverson and 14 apiece from Lamar Odom and Stephon Marbury.

The Americans' key to victory was their shooting, as it was in their quarterfinal win over Spain. After missing all five of their 3-point attempts in the first half against Lithuania, they made eight in the second half — four of them in the final quarter.

The 104 points was the most by any team in the men's tournament, topping the 102 the Americans scored against Spain two nights earlier in the quarterfinals.

Another gold for U.S. women

The women bringing home a basketball gold medal celebrated with the unbridled joy of children at play.

Dawn Staley, Lisa Leslie, Sheryl Swoopes and their U.S. Olympic teammates huddled under Old Glory as if it were a sheltering tent. They laughed and giggled and skipped around the court, soaking up the adulation.

The United States shook off early shooting woes and sloppy play to claim its third straight Olympic title Saturday, a 74-63 victory over Australia.

This is gold medal No. 3 for Staley, Leslie and Swoopes.

They have led the resurgence of U.S. women's basketball internationally after disappointing bronze-medal finishes in the 1992 Olympics and 1994 world championships. They gave their time to training and travel and were joined by other players similarly committed.

The result: 25 straight victories in the Olympics, three golds and two world championships.

Volleyball scrimmage gives team rare game atmosphere

By Kent Hildebrand
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fans got their first glimpse of the 2004 women's volleyball team Saturday at the Purple and White Match in Ahearn Field House.

The purple team, comprised mostly of first-teamers, won the intrasquad scrimmage in four games, 28-30, 30-20, 30-23, 15-9.

The scrimmage served as another tune-up for the regular season but with a game atmosphere Coach Suzie Fritz said.

"It's more game-like, the athletes get excited to play in front of people, and it's very difficult to emulate game-like situations in practice," Fritz said. "We try as much as we can to do that, but ultimately situations like this are the best in terms of preparation for real competition."

Sophomore middle blocker Joy

"Right now, we're a good team, and we want to be a great team. We've got a couple different defensive tactics and offensive tactics we've been working on in practice."

Joy Hamlin
SOPHOMORE MIDDLE BLOCKER

Hamlin said the scrimmage is an opportunity for players to enjoy playing in front of fans again and continue preparation for the season.

"It's good to get out there and see our fans, because they're great people," she said. "Right now, we're a good team, and we want to be a great team. We've got a couple of different defensive tactics and offensive tactics we've been working on in practice. We're hoping to improve early in the season and be great the rest of the season."

With departures from last season and many new faces this year, several positions are still up for grabs, including right-side hitter. Saturday, senior Michaela Franklin and junior Agata Rezende split time on the purple and white squads at the position.

Franklin who led all Wildcats with 20 kills, said they both are working hard for the spot.

"We're just competing very well," she said. "Agata is a great player, and we're just going into practice everyday bringing it all and having a great time with it."

The annual Alumni Match preceded the intrasquad scrimmage and featured former Wildcat stars Lauren Goehring, Cari Jensen, Kris Jensen and others.

The regular season opens 7 p.m. Wednesday in Ahearn Field House against Oral Roberts.

Fritz said the team would start preparing for the match on Monday, but the emphasis remains on the Wildcat's own improvement.

"We've really just focused on what we are doing and trying to get better and that will remain our focus for a good portion of the pre-season," she said. "We have a tough opening stretch of the season, so every workout and every scrimmage is key for us."

Men's golf team looks to build off last season's success

By Angie Hanson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coming off a fourth-place finish at the Big 12 Championship and a 15th-place finish at the NCAA Central Regional last season, men's golf coach Tim Norris said past success has the Wildcats hungry for more this year.

"We are starting to build some tradition and pride in the program. That drives players to improve," Norris said.

Heading into this season, one benefit attributed to last year's success is the level of national recognition the team is receiving.

With recognition comes the privilege to play in more competitive and well-known tournaments, senior Matt Van Cleave said.

"We get to play some of the top courses and against some of the top players in the country," he said.

Van Cleave, a team captain along with junior Ben Kern, said the key to success this season is to have five players consistently qualify for each tournament and play successfully.

Although the team lost key players A.J. Elgert, Aaron Watkins and Tim Moody, Van Cleave said freshmen Greg Blackwell, Clay Hodge and Kyle Yonke will give the team solid participation and added energy.

"The freshmen are just as good and have just as much potential. And they bring some refreshing enthusiasm to the team," he said.

Norris said junior Jonathan James and senior Nick Schumacher — have a chance to make a difference this season.

"If they can get off to a good start and keep their confidence level high, then Johnathan and Nick will play an important role this season," he said.

James said his decision to redshirt last season in order to improve his game will have a positive impact on his level of play.

"Taking a year off definitely gave me a year to work on my game and my confidence. I now have a new outlook on the game," he said.

In addition to James and Schumacher, er, Norris carries high expectations for Van Cleave and Kern.

He said Kern's raw talent and Van Cleave's ability to shoot low scores could be the forces which drive the team.

"Leadership will come from Kern and Van Cleave. I think Kern can carry a lot of the load for our team this year, and he embraces that idea," Norris said. "And Van Cleave is right there with Kern in ability."

Van Cleave said he is ready to assume the responsibility of being team leader, as he wants to help the team in the same way past players helped him.

"I learned a lot from A.J. Elgert and Aaron Watkins. They made me feel comfortable, and I think that's important," he said.

As Van Cleave anticipates the upcoming season, however, there is one thing he said he wants to change.

"The only difference I want to make in this season is getting to nationals. It should be a bigger team goal than it has been," Van Cleave said.

The team's first tournament is Friday, Sept. 10 at the Inverness Intercollegiate in Toledo, Ohio.

Study spots

Campus, city venues offer quiet, relaxing places for homework

By Paul Suter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Finding the right place to study can be as painstaking as the studying itself.

Amanda Ahrens, junior in marketing, said when studying for a big exam, she will be found in Hale Library's third-floor reading room.

She said not many students know about this location, which is a reason she chooses to study there.

"It's always quiet up here. There's always computers up here, and I don't have to wait for one," Ahrens said.

Ahrens said she chooses not to listen to music or be around distraction, and that is why she enjoys the reading room.

"I can come up here to work alone, or work in a group depending upon the type of project," she said.

Hale Library also has a 24-hour study room, where some students, such as Michelle Francis, junior in elementary education, study.

"I like to come down here a lot," Francis said. "Especially in between my classes. I can get some studying done down here before my next class, or just simply meet up with a friend."

The library can be full of students during the day, but Francis said there are generally fewer students in the 24-hour room.

Terri Bammes, junior in information systems, who usually meets up with Francis, said she enjoys the convenience of the room. Bammes said allowing food in the 24-hour study room is a nice perk.

"I come down here for an hour between classes, and it's a convenient place to study before my next classes," Bammes said. "You can also grab a bite to eat here."

One of the more laid back and relaxing places to study is at the Union Station coffee shop, retail manager Eric Von Stein said.

"We have the usual regulars, but there is always a good share of students here during a typical school day,"

Top: Marie Wells, senior in finance, concentrates on her homework while studying in Hale library. Hale library offers many places to study in a quiet environment.

Above: Caitlin Clark, freshman in general engineering, works on homework while in the 24-hour study area in Hale Library. The quiet environment of the study room makes it easier for students to stay focused.

Von Stein said. "The shop is a good place to socialize as well as studying."

"There are large booths and tables to eat at, and also provides a fair amount of space to study at. Most students that do come in tend to study, but many also come buy a cup of coffee," he said. "We also have salads and stacker sandwiches available."

The coffee shop also has plenty of room and computers available to use in addition to its peaceful surrounding, Von Stein said.

"The music and lighting in here is also designed for relaxation and tranquility," he said.

"It has a nice atmosphere and nice mood to the students who come here to study," he said.

Visuals, clever wit make 'Futurama' pure fun

When you are a bona fide dork, you will occasionally find yourself arguing about "the greatest animated series of all time."

Because I think my personal opinion is extremely valid and practically flawless, I venture to argue that the animated series "Futurama" is the best cartoon in the history of television.

"Futurama" was created in 1999 by Matt Groening, who is perhaps better known for masterminding "The Simpsons."

Here, I must digress in my argument and give necessary props to "The Simpsons."

I realize that without that cartoon, Groening's genius never would have been recognized, nor would he have had the clout needed to convince the Fox network executives to try a show like "Futurama."

I also will admit there are times when I think "The Simpsons" is the best animated show to date, but in reality, "The Simpsons" was simply the massive stepping stone Groening needed to launch his science fiction masterpiece.

The basic plot for "Futurama" circles around Philip J. Fry, a 25-year-old loser pizza delivery boy whose life is going no where until he accidentally gets cryogenically frozen on Dec. 31, 1999.

Fry wakes up to find himself in the year 3000, doomed to spend the rest of his days, ironically, as a delivery boy for Planet Express Corporation, a futuristic delivery service that transports packages to all five quadrants of the universe.

"Futurama" is basically a sci-fi cartoon that relies heavily on social commentary.

Like "The Simpsons," "Futurama" is full of pop culture references. It also shares a similar story format to "Simpsons" in that each episode may be adventure filled, but there is still a heavy moral underlying to each story.

This is a key to any series created by Groening. "Futurama" has a definite point to each episode, but, unlike shows like "South Park," Groening leaves the moral more open-ended instead of bludgeoning the viewer with it.

"Futurama" is also an incredibly visual cartoon. The animation is, at times, utterly stunning. With three-dimensional capabilities, it is no feat for the animation directors to re-create scenes from films like "The Matrix."

"Futurama" is also really, really, really smart. This probably has something to do with why the show only ran for four seasons.

Some argue that the Sunday night slot that placed the show in competition with Fox's Sunday football schedule doomed the show from the beginning.

Others argue that a certain expectation was created when the show's connection to "The Simpsons" was advertised. People expected something more family oriented than a science fiction adventure series.

More importantly, I think people have come to expect a cartoon to be something that they will always understand. People expect to always be in on the joke, and if they are not in the know, people feel very uncomfortable.

However, "Futurama" is not the kind of cartoon that codifies the viewer, which probably turns many people off.

The fourth and final season of "Futurama" came out on DVD last Tuesday. This is a series I recommend for anyone, and it is the only cartoon that has literally made me bawl.

Besides, who can resist the charms of a beer swigging robot?

KISS's Simmons might appear on 'Queer Eye'

How would the guys from "Queer Eye for the Straight Guy" make over the black-and-white makeup of Kiss? We may find out.

Gene Simmons, the tongue-wagging bassist of Kiss, is considering an appearance on the Bravo reality show. On his Web site, Simmons says producers have asked him to join the Fab Five for an episode.

"They called me and asked me if I would do it. I'm a fan of the show. We may shoot on the 28th of September," Simmons says.

Bravo publicist Bill Brennan told the Associated Press Friday that the network has had discussions recently with the rocker.

Kilborn says goodbye to 'Late Late Show'

Craig Kilborn bid farewell to viewers of CBS' "Late Late Show" on Friday, concluding five seasons as its host despite the program's expanding audience.

Since announcing two weeks ago that he was leaving, the 42-year-old Kilborn has had difficulty explaining why he is walking away from a show that has seen its audience grow by more than a third during his tenure.

He has said it was simply time to do something else. "It's one of the happiest days of my life, and I'll tell you why," he said.

"I got to do a dream job ... My job is done here. It's time for me to move on. I dreamed of an early retirement and that's probably what I got."

Kilborn had drawn solid ratings for CBS since he took the time slot over from Tom Snyder.

Paris Hilton to publish memoir

Paris Hilton is trying on a new outfit: a hard cover. The model and reality TV star is publishing a 198-page memoir, "Confessions of an Heiress: A Tongue-in-Chic Peek Behind the Pose."

Hilton writes about her youth as an heiress in a "really close" family. Excerpts of the book (to hit shelves Sept. 7) are printed in the Sept. 6 issue of People magazine.

"It's traditional for an heiress to be raised in a sheltered way," she writes. "No one thinks that's true of me, but it actually was."

Still, Hilton insists that she was not coddled: "The rumor is that I got a credit card at age 9, which is ridiculous. It was more like 19, and I had to get one myself without my parents."

Hilton's memoirs are not without fashion tips, either. "Trust me, people act differently to you when you've got jewelry on your head."

Add Christian Dior to the list of Charlize Theron fans. The company announced the Oscar winner will be the new face of J'adore, the designer's fragrance that debuted in 2000.

Theron will start appearing in print ads and TV commercials next month — about the same time that ads for Chanel No. 5, featuring another Oscar winner, Nicole Kidman, debut.

"Ms. Theron was chosen because she represents modern femininity and embodies the spirit and energy of Dior. She is a classic beauty," said Pamela Baxter, president and CEO of LVMH Perfumes and Cosmetics, Dior's parent company.

The advertising deal with Theron is the first one between the beauty brand and a celebrity.

Storm pummels South Carolina cities

By Bruce Smith
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MOUNT PLEASANT, S.C. — Tropical Storm Gaston sloshed ashore Sunday in South Carolina, spinning sheets of rain and near hurricane-force wind as it uprooted trees, flooded roads and knocked out power to at least 125,000 homes.

Gov. Mark Sanford declared a state of emergency as the storm moved inland and encouraged "folks to stay in their homes for the time being so that damage assessment crews, utility truck crews and debris removal crews can do their jobs."

The storm made landfall at Bulls Bay near McClellanville, just a few miles from where Hurricane Charley made a second landfall after devastating southwest Florida earlier this month.

As much as eight inches of rain fell along some parts of the coast by midday, and a flash flood watch was in effect.

Steady sheets of rain fell in Mount Pleasant hours after the eye of Gaston came ashore. Tree limbs littered flooded roadways, some of which were impassable. Palmettos planted earlier this year on a new boulevard were pushed to the pavement, and road signs twisted in the wind.

Across the harbor in Charleston, Gaston flooded streets and pushed over power poles. At least 75,000 people were without power at the height of the storm.

"The best advice for everyone is to stay put. Stay put, don't go out please," said Charleston's mayor, Joseph P. Riley Jr. "This will be past us quickly, and let's just stay out of harm's way and get it behind us."

By midday, the storm was moving north about 8 mph toward inland South Carolina, weakening along the way but still prompting flood watches and warnings of wind gusts as high as 60 mph.

The rain along the coast was tapering off, although blustery winds still raked the coastline near Charleston and intersections throughout the area had no traffic lights.

A resident helps guide an SUV through flooded Ashley St. Sunday in downtown Charleston, S.C. The flooding is a result of slow moving Tropical Storm Gaston, which has caused widespread flooding and at least one serious injury.

"The important thing is that we don't have any false sense of safety that it's all over," Riley said. "We have downed trees, and often times there are power lines under those downed trees."

Charleston County officials said there was only one initial report of a serious injury — a resident injured when a tree fell on a home.

"It just goes to show that the residents took the proper precautions that they needed to take and shows they were prepared," said Roland Windham, the Charleston County administrator. "We hope we don't experience any more injuries during the cleanup. That's typically when you see a lot of injuries occur."

Residents in low-lying areas in Charleston and Georgetown counties were urged to move to higher ground before the storm hit. Authorities also asked people living in mobile homes to evacuate.

John Legare of the state emergency management agency said about 30 people sought refuge in five shelters in coastal counties as Gaston approached. Shelters were opened in at least one inland county.

A flood watch also was issued for parts of North Carolina.

Gaston — the hurricane season's seventh named storm — had maximum sustained winds near 60 mph by midday, down from 70 mph when it hit land. A storm becomes a hurricane when its winds reach 74 mph.

Legare was optimistic that the storm had picked up speed, which could mean less flooding.

"The faster it moves, the less chance it has to rain," Legare said. "But until it has passed through, I don't think we can say flooding is not a concern."

In the Atlantic Ocean, meanwhile, Hurricane Frances strengthened to a Category 4 hurricane with maximum sustained winds of 135 mph. The storm's center was about 550 miles east of the Leeward Islands in the southeastern Caribbean.

The National Hurricane Center in Miami said people from Cuba to the southeastern United States should closely monitor the progress of the storm, which could strengthen on Sunday and threaten land by Labor Day weekend.

Two men arrested in alleged plot to bomb NYC subway

By Tom Hays
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — A U.S. citizen and a Pakistani national were arrested in an alleged plot to bomb a subway station in midtown Manhattan and possibly other locations around the city, police said Saturday.

Police Commissioner Ray Kelly said the men were not thought to be connected to al-Qaeda or any other international terrorist organization, although he said they expressed hatred for America.

The arrests came two days before the start of the Republican National Convention, which is drawing tens of thousands of visitors to the city.

Though there was no clear tie to the convention, authorities moved to arrest the two men before it began.

The men had been under police surveillance and had discussed placing explosives at the Herald Square subway station and stations at 42nd and 59th streets, Kelly said. The men never obtained explosives, he said.

"It was clear that they had the intention to cause damage, to kill people," Kelly said. "They did not immediately have the means to do it."

He identified the men as Shahawar Matin Siraj, 21, a Pakistani living in Queens, and James Elshafay, 19, a U.S. citizen living on Staten Island.

Kelly said the men visited the Herald Square 34th Street station — one block from Madison Square Garden, the site of the convention — on Aug. 21.

After walking through the station, the pair drew diagrams of the station "in order to facilitate the later planting of the explosive devices," then gave the drawings to a paid police informant, according to the complaint.

In secretly recorded conversations with the informant, Siraj said he was "ready for jihad," and Elshafay "discussed his hatred for the 'Zionists' and expressed ... his solidarity with the Palestinian people," according to the complaint.

The men were being charged with conspiracy to blow up the station, which is central to a large commercial district, including Macy's flagship department store.

They appeared before a federal judge in Brooklyn and were ordered held until a later hearing. Attorney Tom Dunn, who represents Elshafay, said his client would plead not guilty. Siraj's attorney, Heidi Cesare, had no comment.

Elshafay's mother left the courtroom weeping.

"We're proud to be Americans," said the woman, who did not give her name.

The men also scouted three police stations on Staten Island and a jail there.

Mexico City's populist mayor bets political future

By Mark Stevenson
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MEXICO CITY — Mexico City's leftist mayor led more than 150,000 demonstrators in a march Sunday to protest efforts to impeach him, an issue his supporters say threatens Mexico's political stability and pits "those on the bottom" against "those on top."

Protesters brought in by hundreds of buses from nearby states mingled with local supporters of Mayor Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador, a leading contender in the 2006 presidential race who critics liken to Hugo Chavez, the populist president of Venezuela.

While Lopez Obrador denies similarities with the one-time Venezuelan coup leader, he rallied his followers with fighting words, saying he represented "los de abajo," roughly "the underdogs," the title of a famous novel about peasant rebels in Mexico's 1910 Revolution.

Although he didn't declare his candidacy, Lopez Obrador laid out a campaign platform that envisioned a return to a more self-sufficient, oil-based economy and a renegotiation of part of the public debt, measures Mexico tried two decades ago.

"We have to recover the best of Mexican history; that's where Mexico's character is," Lopez Obrador told a cheering crowd. "We should return to the policy of state support that has been practically eliminated by free-market policies."

Much of Lopez Obrador's speech — "We favor a responsible, productive private sector with social commitment" — sounded strikingly like the 1970s rhetoric of the former ruling party.

Lopez Obrador stoked class passions, saying earlier: "The ones on top aren't going to come. They just dine and drink fine wines and make decisions that hurt the little guy."

Federal prosecutors filed a case to remove Lopez Obrador's official immunity from prosecution — a move that would bar him from running in 2006 — because he allegedly ignored court orders in a land-use case in which the city allegedly infringed on private property.

Lopez Obrador argues that many other officials have ignored similar court orders, but that he was singled out for prosecution because his opponents — purportedly including President Vicente Fox — want to knock him out of the 2006 race.

Many in the march — made up of farmers from Lopez Obrador's state of Tabasco and local neighborhood groups, street vendors and retirees' organizations — vowed to defend the mayor's presidential hopes by any means necessary.

"The people are going to start a rebellion" if Lopez Obrador is impeached, pledged Rigoberto Benetiz, a 60-year-old farmer who led protesters from the southern state of Guerrero.

The rebel rhetoric isn't limited to just some supporters; top officials of Lopez Obrador's Democratic Revolution Party, the PRD, have threatened political instability and possibly violence if Lopez Obrador is impeached.

"This could lead the country into serious and grave conflicts," said PRD-affiliated Gov. Leonel Cota de Baja California earlier this month, noting some supporters could take "the route of arms, of mobilization, of confrontation" if he is impeached.

The mayor has portrayed himself for months as the victim of a political conspiracy, at first in response to an ongoing corruption scandal involving videotapes of city officials accepting cash from a businessman and spending in Las Vegas.

Chechens vote for new president

By Mike Eckel
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

GROZNY, Russia — Against a backdrop of war, squalor and terrorism, Chechens voted Sunday for a replacement for their assassinated president in a vote the Kremlin hopes will bring some stability to the violence-torn region. A man was killed when he attempted to blow up a polling station.

Kremlin backing has made Chechnya's top police official, Maj. Gen. Alu Alkhanov, the unquestioned favorite in the race. Russian officials have warned Chechen rebels might stage attacks to mar the voting — a danger highlighted by the near simultaneous crashes of two jetliners last week that killed 90 people.

Traces of explosives were found in the wreckage of both jets, and there are suspicions two Chechen women conducted the suicide attacks.

In the Chechen capital Grozny, a man tried to bring a suspicious package to a polling station and when guards at the polling station asked to see it, he ran away. The package blew up and the man was killed, elections commission head Abdulkarim Arskhanov said in comments shown on the NTV television channel.

No other casualties were reported and the polling station continued to operate, according to NTV.

The election is part of the Kremlin's strategy to undermine support for separatist rebels — who have been fighting Russian forces for nearly five years — by inducing a sense of civil order in the ruined southern republic.

Turnout was more than 79 percent of the electorate, the ITAR-Tass news agency cited Arskhanov as saying after the polls closed. That claim could not be verified, and there was suspicion ahead of the voting that the results would be manipulated.

Alkhanov is seeking to replace Akhmad Kadyrov, the man who was the key to the Kremlin's attempts to add a veneer of political stability to Chechnya. Kadyrov was brought to power in an election last October, but he was killed in a bomb blast May in Grozny.

The other six candidates in the race are thought to have little chance. One of them, Movsur Khamidov, complained Sunday of fraud at the polls.

"Violations were manifested everywhere," Khamidov said. One of his representatives, Asludin Khachukayev, said he discovered ballot boxes at one polling station were almost full of ballots just 15 minutes after the station opened.

Police and soldiers were out in force, riding in cars or manning checkpoints. Pedestrians were scarce on the city's streets, lined with rows of shattered apartment buildings with collapsed floors and large holes in their facades.

In Urus-Martan, Alkhanov's hometown 20 miles south of Grozny, campaign posters for him were attached to an elections commission banner that urged Chechens to "vote for peace."

Uvais Pintashev, who works in a small snack shop across from a polling station in Urus-Martan, said he voted for Alkhanov. "Of course we voted for him," said Pintashev, whose house was ruined in fighting in 1999. "There's no question he has won; he won long ago. Whatever Moscow says will be, will be."

The Kremlin has thrown its support heavily behind Alkhanov. When Russian President Vladimir Putin made a surprise visit to Kadyrov's grave last week, state television showed Alkhanov beside him. Alkhanov appears frequently on television newscasts while the other candidates are rarely, if ever, seen.

The lack of any real opposition to Alkhanov has led human rights group and many Chechens to assume the election result was inevitable, as was last year's election of Kadyrov.

CONVENTION | NYC police arrest more than 300 protesters on eve of Republicans' national event

offensive that led to the April 2003 fall of Baghdad "a catastrophic success" in light of the fact that fighting continues to this day despite the overthrow of Saddam Hussein's government.

That brought an immediate response from Democratic vice presidential nominee John Edwards.

"President Bush now says his Iraq policy is a catastrophic success. He's half right. It was catastrophic to rush to war without a plan to win the peace," Edwards said.

Pre-convention polls showed the presidential race evenly split between Bush and Democrat John Kerry, although the challenger has lost ground since his convention in Boston a month ago.

The four-day Republican meeting opens Monday.

The demonstrators took their protests of Bush's foreign and economic policies to the fortified streets of midtown Manhattan, swarming up Seventh Avenue past the convention site shouting "No More Bush."

"The majority of this country wants the Bush administration out of office," filmmaker and Bush critic Michael Moore told the crowd. A large banner said, "Save America. Defeat Bush." People poked their heads out of apartment windows to watch the marchers in the sweltering heat.

About 45 protesters on bicycles were detained and bound with plastic handcuffs just off the march route, police said. More than 300 people had been arrested through Saturday night for disorderly conduct and convention-related incidents.

Bush went to church Sunday morning, rode his mountain bike and was flying later to Wheeling, W.Va., for a rally. He was campaigning in battleground states as he makes his way to this overwhelmingly Democratic convention city.

Kerry was spending the day at his beachfront home in Nantucket, Mass.

Former President Clinton, speaking in New York City at the interdenominational Riverside Church, asserted that religious faith was "not the exclusive province of the right wing."

"The religious right has tried to turn all of us, in disagreeing with them, into two-dimensional cartoons," Clinton said.

Politicians of both parties made the rounds of television talk shows.

Sen. Zell Miller, a Georgia Democrat who will deliver the keynote address Wednesday night, said he'd never voted for a Republican for president, "but I'm going to this time."

Kerry "is not in the mainstream of this country," Miller said on Fox News Sunday.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., attributed Kerry's slight loss of ground in recent polls to television ads challenging Kerry's military service in Vietnam aboard Navy Swift boats.

"I can think of no other reason. I've never seen anything like it in the 22 years that I've been active in politics," McCain told CBS' "Face the Nation."

McCain has called on Bush to denounce ads by the group Swift Boat Veterans for Truth that accuse Kerry of lying about his combat service.

Bush has said all ads by independent outside groups, including those aimed at him, should be stopped and has promised to work with McCain to go to court to try to block such ads. McCain addresses the convention Monday night.

"We don't have to deal with other activities or the campus being so busy. Plus, the weather is more predictable now, and we couldn't ask for better weather today."

Members of Kappa Kappa Gamma and Delta Chi served as members of the coaching and support staff.

Natalie Shoup, junior in marketing and Kappa Kappa Gamma coach for Sigma Nu fraternity, said she and the other coaches led the fraternity members in a stretch routine before the event.

"We had a team huddle and got them pumped up and ready to play," Shoup said.

Shoup said during her first year as a team coach, she and the other coaches brought Sigma Nu players pizza to wake them up Sunday morning.

"We dressed up in costumes and are having a lot of fun," Shoup said.

Kristin Burton, junior in biology and pre-veterinary, chose to watch the event instead of coach.

"The boys get the ball up in the air and keep it there for longer," Burton, Kappa Kappa Gamma member, said.

Kris Coen, freshman in architecture and member of Alpha Delta Pi sorority, said it is her sorority's first time to participate.

"It's been a lot of fun," Coen said.

Jennifer Lyon, junior in pre-law and member of Kappa Delta sorority, said the key to keeping her team pumped up was to keep her own energy high.

"I'm pretty involved with sports, so this is a great opportunity to share it and cheerlead the team to victory," Lyon said.

WHEAT | Scientists find wheat can battle cancer

Carter said that the reason he wants the public to be aware of this information is for prevention.

"Currently 90 percent of all colon cancer can be prevented with a change in diet," Carter said. "Currently there are over 43,000 cases of colon cancer every year in the United States."

Ron Madl, a researcher at K-State, worked on the study for the past four years.

"The medical industry published some very confusing studies," Madl said. "Some said wheat was beneficial to preventing cancer and some said it wasn't.

"We wanted to resolve that confusion."

Initially, the study showed diets containing the same level of wheat bran but different levels of anti-oxidants exhibited dramatically different capacity to suppress tumor development.

"We fed the mice different levels of anti-oxidants and found out that the tendency to get colon cancer greatly reduced with a higher level of anti-oxidant," Madl said.

A correlation could be seen throughout the different levels of anti-oxidants fed to the mice.

"The mice with lower levels of anti-oxidants had higher incidents of cancer," Madl said.

The short-term goals for this study are only informative.

"In the short term we want to show people that low-carb diets have the effect of eliminating micro-nutrients from a person's diet," Madl said. "We want to stray people away from restrictive diets that would exclude wheat, which is very nutritious."

"In the long term we want the benefits of whole wheat production to be recognized."

Regulations limit parking for football fans

By Jessica Ballard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A wave of purple is ready to paint the town with football season coming up, but for residents west of the stadium, the flood of purple could be troublesome.

For the sake of these residents, new regulations may alleviate parking problems.

City Manager Ron Fehr issued an administrative order limiting parking to one side of the street in many areas west of the stadium come football season. Eric Cattell, assistant director for planning, said.

Home game parking congested the already narrow streets, and lawn parking was not technically allowed.

"That's sort of what started this whole debate," Cattell said.

"Most importantly, emergency vehicles need through," he said.

Having cars on only one side will allow more room for such vehicles to move quickly, he said.

Israeli diplomat cited as suspect in spy controversy

By Karin Laub
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

JERUSALEM — A senior Israeli diplomat in Washington has met with a Pentagon analyst being investigated by the FBI on suspicion he passed classified information to Israel, Israeli officials confirmed Monday.

They reiterated, however, that Israel does not have a spy at the Pentagon. Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom said meetings between Israeli embassy employees and U.S. government officials are commonplace, and that the two governments routinely share secrets.

"Israel and the United States have intimate ties ... and the information being exchanged is much more classified than any conversation that may have taken place," Shalom told a news conference.

U.S. officials say the FBI investigation focuses on Lawrence Franklin, an analyst of

New apartment complexes reflect need for housing as enrollment rises

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Houses on Bluemont Avenue are disappearing. Apartment complexes are replacing some of the traditional family houses that once occupied the neighborhood.

Ron Fehr, city manager, said the sudden developments are due in part to rezoning. Some of the zones originally set for a family-oriented residential area have been rezoned to allow higher density living spaces.

"We wanted to create situations with higher-density housing closer to campus," he said. "We had circumstances where we were getting a lot of single family homes being converted into super duplexes that were student-oriented.

"We are preserving the areas farther away for family occupancy."

Larry Limbocker, property manager of a house located at 1000 Bluemont Ave., said the new complexes are needed because the university is growing.

"It's a natural progression that is bound to occur," he said. "You can't tell President Wefald to stop enrolling students."

Sam Schmidt, Riley County appraiser, said property values should continue their upward trend despite the redevelopment.

"I've been here for 25 years, and it hasn't stopped since," he said.

Limbocker agreed.

"The properties near the university will always be more valuable," he said.

Developments currently under way include a 12-unit apartment complex at 1010 Bluemont Ave. and another nine-unit complex at 1020 Bluemont Ave.

A 14-unit complex at 1029 Vattier St. has just been completed and residents have moved in, Schmidt said.

Limbocker said although some houses are being replaced by apartment complexes, he thinks he still will have a job as a property manager.

KSDB managers request $82,000 in fee allocations

By Scott Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

KSDB-FM 91.9 is asking Student Governing Association for a major increase in their student privilege fee allocations.

In a meeting Monday night, KSDB news director Aaron Leiker, senior in mass communications, and programming director Andrew Latham, junior in fine arts, presented a proposal to the privilege fee committee asking for a yearly increase of $82,337.68, to a new yearly total of $144,642.68, in addition to a one-time allocation of $58,366.40 for the construction of a news room Leiker said.

Leiker said funding for KSDB was "far behind" that of stations at other Big 12 institutions.

According to the 33-page proposal, $94,642.68 would be given to KSDB as part of privilege fees and the other $50,000 would be "granted to KSDB on behalf of all student organizations" to allow all 314 student organizations registered with the Office of Student Activities and Services free advertising on the station, averaging out to $160 per organization.

Privilege Fee Committee Chair Michael Burns, junior in agriculture education, said the size of the requested increase was out of the ordinary.

"It's something I've never experienced before," Burns said. "But it is definitely their right as students to do that."

He said most of the privilege fee proposals they see are just requests to renew the existing funding, but occasionally increases are requested.

Leiker said for years, KSDB received $30,000 per year each time their allocation came up, but recently the station has received more money.

Burns said the committee would review the proposal again at its next meeting on Sept. 13.

After that, he said it could see the senate floor as early as Sept. 16 with final action on Sept. 23, but more likely he said it would be on the floor Sept. 23 and voted on at the Sept. 30 meeting.

He said the committee has the power to fail, pass or alter the proposal. "We can alter it," Burns said. "If we feel, for instance, that the advertising grant idea is a good idea, but don't want $50,000, we could decide to only give it 20 (thousand)."

He said whatever the committee decides to do, it will be based on what the students deserve first.

"If we can see the radio station can better benefit the students, then an increase is needed, but initially I wouldn't say an increase for how much they are asking," Burns said.

Joshua Sharp, senior in electronic journalism, adjusts settings in the KSDB-FM 91.9 radio studio Monday night. The station is planning for future renovation by adding a newsroom and equipment.

READERS' REPRESENTATIVE FOR THE COLLEGIAN

GREEK OR INDEPENDENT?

Do we have two different university settings at K-State in the Greek and independent living environments?

As I listened to your comments on the topic of the week, I saw many of you wore t-shirts representing your living environments. This can become an issue when it divides us.

As a student body we need to embrace our differences, bond as a community and not run away and hide in our own little environments.

As I heard from your comments, we do have two separate settings at K-State.

Andrew Franssen, junior in mechanical engineering and independent student, said, "Greeks can be very exclusive in who they will hang out with, but I also know people who refuse to have anything to do with somebody wearing Greek letters on their t-shirt."

The Greeks I spoke with said they believe they are not purposely avoiding or separating themselves from the independent student.

If K-State is touting itself as a diverse university, we will have to learn to embrace our differences and come to the realization that we are one school.

Instead of a weekly topic, I'm interested in your feedback on the Collegian from this past week — what you enjoyed about it, what you didn't, where we can improve. Similarly, you can expect to hear from me about what's going on at the paper and what you can expect from us.

DIVERSITY TRAINING

The Collegian took an important step in training its staff members last week when it brought Luis Duguid to campus.

Duguid, a columnist for the Kansas City Star, spoke to employees from Student Publications Inc. and KSDB-FM 91.9 on the media's responsibility of covering an increasingly diverse world.

We also discussed the importance of hiring and maintaining a diverse staff — for our profession, the retention numbers at many newspapers are nothing short of disappointing.

As journalists, we should always question our reasoning behind covering the people and events we do: Are we being sensitive to issues that concern our readers of color? Of different religions? Why did we run that story, or why didn't we run that one? With the decisions we make, we must keep the interest of our readers on our minds.

Did you know?

Minorities in journalism

In 2003, 6,900 minorities were employed at daily newspapers. That's 12.53 percent of the total workforce, which was 54,700.

Of that number, 1,312 were in a supervisory position (or 9.9 percent). That's out of 13,247 journalists in supervisory roles at daily newspapers.

What's your diet like?

1. What do you snack on between classes?

- A. A Ziploc baggie of baby carrot sticks
- B. Some crackers and a diet soda.
- C. A delicious meat smoothie.

2. How do you combat potential weight gain?

- A. Pray to the Weight Watcher gods.
- B. Simply watch what you eat and exercise more.
- C. You can't battle fate — especially if it involves a pint of Ben and Jerry's.

3. In your free time, you:

- A. Go for a jog or play racquetball at the Rec.
- B. Read a good book and enjoy some yogurt.
- C. Go through your head and alphabetize your favorite pizza toppings.

5. In physical appearance, you most closely resemble:

- A. Calista Flockhart
- B. David Beckham
- C. a pear

6. Your only wish is:

- A. For physical perfection.
- B. To be happy and healthy
- C. To deep fry every piece of food in your panty.

If you answered mostly A, you're in perfect health, but it might be too large of a focus in your life. Find balance and you will be happy.

If you answered mostly B, you've found the balance between health and happiness. You likely are content with your life and don't obsess about personal appearance.

If you answered mostly C, people probably mistake you for John Candy on a regular basis. Try not incorporating cookie dough into all of your meals or scraping the peanut butter off that celery stick and you will be on the slow but steady track to better health.

Firefighters visit campus for emergency-training

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Firefighters from Emporia, Lawrence, Salina and Manhattan were on campus Monday training for rescues and confined spaces.

The trainees wore their gear down into the steam vents on campus between English and Counseling Services and Hale Library.

The required training was at K-State because of the opportunity to train on a campus setting, said Brent Morales, instructor for the group and employee of Roco Corporation, the company which trains firefighters on the tactics.

"This is one requirement these men had yet to meet," Morales said.

"This is the first time these men have done this training and without it they couldn't qualify for the job."

Michael Paph, K-State facilities maintenance supervisor for the plumbing shop, said he was happy to see the training take place at K-State.

"This is a good way to make sure they can help us out in case of an accident and one of the workers is stuck," Paph said.

Bill West, trainee from Emporia, said all trainees had a similar setup in their particular areas.

"We all have the campus with steam vents where the same type of problems can occur," West said.

"This can train us to prevent the problems where a bad situation can occur."

TO THE POINT Gameday rules establish balance between safety, convenience

The goal of any city administration should be to balance things like public safety and convenience.

Issues such as parking restrictions in residential areas west of KSU Stadium on game days are a perfect example of the necessity of such a balance.

On the one hand, the convenience of allowing residents to park their own vehicles in their lawns, or permitting others to do so, could greatly reduce congestion in the area during these times of extremely high traffic.

However, such issues also might present safety concerns if an emergency vehicle were to be hindered by congestion either in the streets or on individual yards.

Safety, especially during events that produce high traffic and have the potential for injury or incidents, should be considered, but the factor of convenience is important as well.

The City Commission's decision regarding parking in this area should be commended for striking an adequate balance between the convenience of additional lawn parking and the safety of the home-owners and inhabitants of the area.

Independent ads cause confusion, create rift in political arena

In the past few weeks, the political debate has focused on a group called Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, a group that has accused Sen. John Kerry of lying about his service and alleged he is unfit to lead America.

CHAZ STEIMEL

It's hard to tell whether or not the veterans have a case, but one thing that is certain - the way the group is approaching this election year is definitely counterproductive.

There is a fine line between expressing your opinion and abusing the opportunities that money presents to affect an election.

SBVT is what is called a 527 group, after its tax identifier, and it is not the only outside advertiser that has muddled the political waters.

Other 527s include MoveOn.org and The Media Fund.

According to National Public Radio, these 527s have more than $125 million to spend on advertisements against both Bush and Kerry.

Thanks to the 527, our political system has changed in some very divergent ways over the past four years. Shortly after the 2000 election title match fight in Florida that Bush won by TKO, the McCain-Feingold law ushered in a new era of politics.

Under this new law, all corporate money was banned and private donations to campaigns were limited, removing nearly all the influence of big money from the election.

Americans thought their elections system had taken a step forward.

However, a loophole occurred when the Federal Election Commission failed to limit 527s in the spring.

Now, groups such as Swift Boat Veterans for Truth can spend as much money as they want, undermining the principles of the McCain-Feingold law and negatively affecting American politics.

Most 527 groups do a great service for the American people by conducting voter registration and promoting issues that need to be discussed, but others only help turn our political arena into a madhouse.

One problem 527s exacerbate is divisiveness. Shortly after the FEC ruling on 527s, the Bush campaign released a statement that seems to have come true.

"Thanks to the deliberate inaction by the Federal Election Commission, the battle of the 527s is likely to escalate to a full scale, two sided war."

With as much controversy as the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth have created, even Kerry has to agree.

As the Baltimore Sun points out, many among my generation have tuned national politics out all together because of the partisanship and lack of true discussion.

A typical political debate now goes something like this:

"He is the best candidate."

"NO, HE IS THE WORST!"

This kind of dialogue lacks solid conversation on critical issues. By increasing the partisan divisiveness, we only increase apathy in our generation. That in turn weakens our democracy.

Even worse is that 527s allow undue influence into the political arena.

The McCain-Feingold law was designed as a way to help clean up politics by limiting the power of money.

However, some 527s allow the rich to affect the outcome of elections by accepting huge donations and spending the money on attack ads.

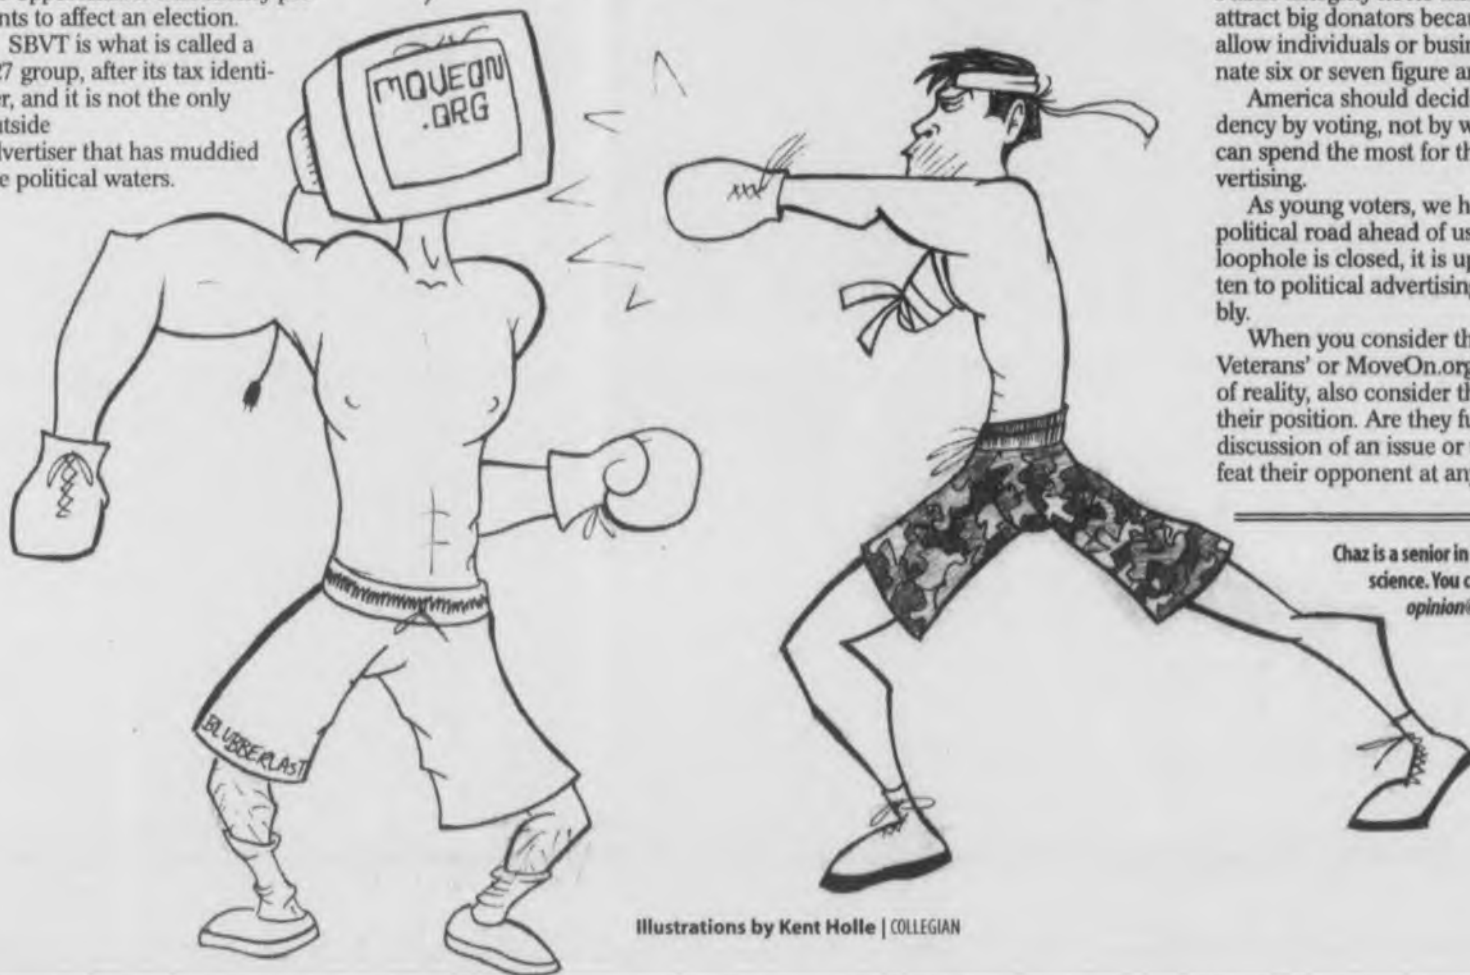

Derek Willis of the Center for Public Integrity notes that 527 groups attract big donors because they allow individuals or businesses to donate six or seven figure amounts.

America should decide the presidency by voting, not by which side can spend the most for the best advertising.

As young voters, we have a long political road ahead of us. Until this loophole is closed, it is up to us to listen to political advertising responsibly.

When you consider the Swift Boat Veterans' or MoveOn.org's account of reality, also consider the reality of their position. Are they furthering discussion of an issue or trying to defeat their opponent at any cost?

Iraqi negotiations force sacrifice, not peace

The bloody standoff in Najaf was ended by the dramatic intervention of the Grand Ayatollah Al-Sistani. Militiamen and freedom fighters loyal to braveheart Muqtada al-Sadr withdrew Friday.

ALTAF KARIM

Al-Sadr decided to leave Najaf after realizing that the blind arrogance of the U.S. forces had become a direct threat to the Imam Ali Shrine (one of the holiest places for not only Shia, but the whole Muslim world).

Every bullet fired by the U.S. troops at the Holy Shrine and at the human wall protecting this sacred place raised the rank of the Iraqi freedom fighters in the eyes of many Muslims.

Al-Sadr's withdrawal seems to me a sacrifice rather than a peace agreement.

Peace always originates from hearts and minds.

People can be blackmailed and forced to compromise in order to live under suppression and illegitimate occupation, but that is not a peace.

Al-Sadr has been consistent in his opposition to U.S. occupation of Iraq, but was also consistent in his opposition to the regime of Saddam Hussein.

The al-Sadr family has paid a heavy price for opposing that dictator. Al-Sadr's uncle was executed in 1980, and his father and two brothers were shot dead in February 1999.

About the U.S. occupation, al-

Sadr has said, "There can be no politics under occupation, no freedom under occupation, no democracy under occupation."

If you look at the record of the current U.S.-installed Iraqi government, you will agree with him.

According to Time magazine and "Wikipedia," Iyad Allawi, the interim prime minister of Iraq, was recruited by the CIA in 1992 as a counterpoint to the more well-known CIA asset con man Ahmad Chalabi.

According to former CIA officers, Allawi organized terrorist attacks in Iraq while working for the CIA between 1992 and 1995, allegedly bombing a cinema and a school bus full of children.

Allawi also is alleged to have personally executed six Iraqi prisoners in June 2004 to "send a clear message to the police on how to deal with insurgents."

So what do you expect under the rule of this new, unscrupulous mercenary leader?

Would these opportunist politicians (wolves wearing the skins of lambs) be able to restore democracy in Iraq?

Of course not. A recent poll showed Allawi's approval rating at just 2 percent, tied with Saddam Hussein.

Allawi's puppet government is a good example of the bully politics of American imperialism based on the idea of recruiting people who do not truly represent or care for their own people.

Clearly, the United States doesn't seem to be honest in its efforts to bring true democracy and peace in Iraq.

Instead, it seems more interested in installing people in the government who will favor the United States.

So what is so radical about saying, "Muslims around the world have a duty and legitimate claim to oppose and fight the unjustified political and military oppression of Muslims by any nation, but the fight must be against those who are combatants, not civilians?"

In order to restore the so-called peace, the U.S. cunningly used the Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani and his religious authority and by doing so, sustained longer its occupation.

This political manipulation of the U.S. and Iraqi governments broke the momentum of the freedom movement led by al-Sadr.

Apparently both sides, Al-Sadr and U.S. forces, combined with Iraqi government, have agreed on a so-called peace deal, but I predict that whatever happens in Najaf, the al-Sadr phenomenon will be there to stay, especially since common people are involved in this movement.

The Iraqi people who died during their struggle for freedom became immortal. Their spirit of freedom survives and it will evolve through generations and generations.

My hat is off for those who fought for their freedom and to those born to say aloud, "There is no superpower but God."

Plan for research center considered

By Scott Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan City Commissioners are considering funding a $6 million dollar research facility for the National Institute of Strategic Technology Acquisition and Commercialization, to be constructed in the K-State Research Park.

Ron Sampson, president of NISTAC, which was formerly known as the Mid-America Commercialization Corporation, said the organization's call was to help transition technologies developed through research at K-State into the commercial market.

"Our mission really is to advance technologies through the commercialization process," Sampson said. "That is, taking new technologies and getting them into use where they can do economic and social good."

He said the organization would be working through the Kansas Technology Enterprise Corporation in cooperation with K-State, the City of Manhattan and the State of Kansas.

In addition to helping in the commercialization process, Sampson said NISTAC works to acquire patents and technologies from major corporations and apply them to technology created at K-State to create a marketable product.

"We try to acquire technologies from large corporations, and sometimes we are able to use those to assist research at K-State," he said.

He said the beverage Cal-C was created with technologies NISTAC acquired from Procter & Gamble and is now being produced by the company NutriJoy, Inc., which NISTAC created.

"In addition to Cal-C, we are using the same technology in the Department of Human Nutrition in the College of Human Ecology," Sampson said. "That illustrates how we acquire technologies that are used for research at K-state and create new companies, which also means new jobs."

The organization is seeking $6 million from the commission to build a new facility in the K-State research park, Sampson said.

Sampson said the current facilities are inadequate to provide for the specialized requirements to facilitate the shift towards the BioScience arena.

He said the advantage to the city and what distinguishes this proposal from many others is that the city would not be giving the money in the form of a grant, rather purchasing the building, which the city would maintain as an asset.

"If the city sells the existing building, it can get double what it paid for it in '96," Sampson said. "Over the long haul, the city will actually get money back out of the building."

"This is a temporary use of city money, not a grant or a gift," he said.

Diane Stoddard, assistant city manager for the city of Manhattan, said the proposal calls for the City to fund the costs of constructing and outfitting the building, which the city would then own.

She said the city then would lease the building to NISTAC for $1 per year, the same agreement that was reached on NISTAC's current facility on Hayes Drive, which the city still owns.

Stoddard said the funds for the new facility would come from the city's share of a half-cent sales tax imposed by Riley County for taxes, which is projected to yield about $17 million in economic development funding by the year 2012.

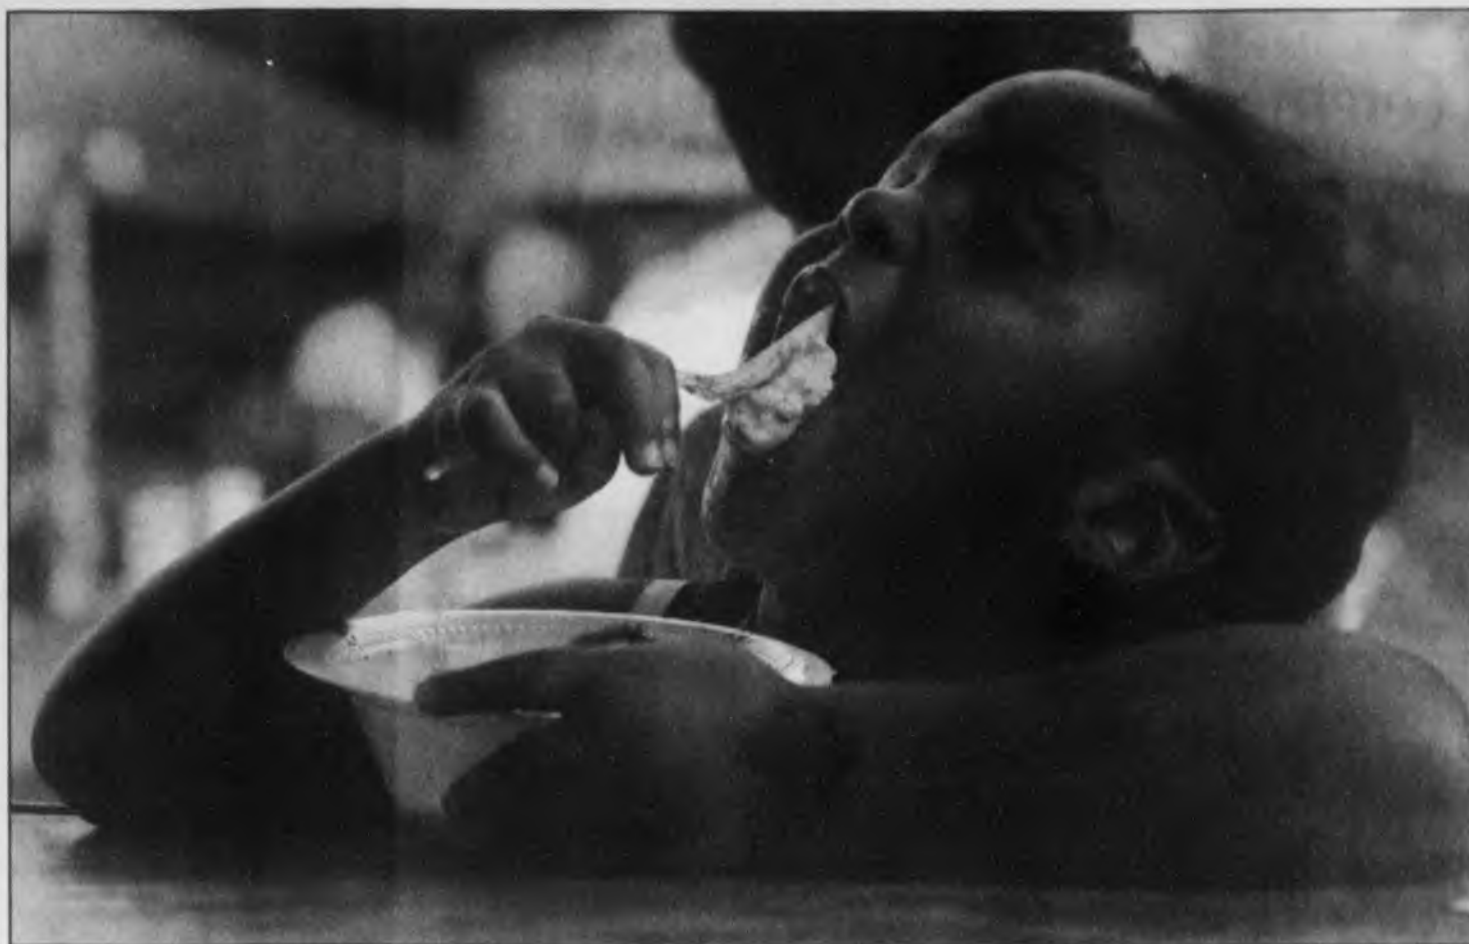

Lyle Butler, president and CEO of the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce, said there are ways the proposal would benefit the City of Manhattan.

"This is going to provide quality jobs to the city of Manhattan," Butler said.

"We're looking at about 200 new jobs that are going to be above average wages with benefits."

K-State receives cattle research grant

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In cooperation with the Kansas Department of Animal Health, K-State is one of 29 locations sharing a $11.64 million grant from the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

K-State is receiving $805,000 to help develop a national identification system for cattle called radio frequency identification.

With the RFID, cattle are identified when loaded onto the trucks, and KSDA officials will be able to access the data during specified emergencies, such as hoof-and-mouth disease.

Dale Blasi, animal science professor and beef specialist, said the system will be similar to the electronic scanners in grocery stores, but will use radio frequencies.

"The animals have a tag in their left ears, and they're scanned in when they're loaded onto the trucks," Blasi said.

Mark Spire, K-State research veterinarian, said this system fits well with the USDA's desire to have the capability for 48-hour trace-back capabilities.

"Cattle transported from either coast can be in Kansas within 36 hours," he said. "Disease can spread in such a rapid manner, it's important to track it from the farm of origin through the marketing process and all the way to the slaughter."

The grant was announced about three weeks ago, and Blasi said researchers hope to have a pilot model finished by the beginning of 2005. He said planning includes engineering the equipment to be used on the trucks, training the drivers to use the equipment and testing the equipment with 20,000 head of cattle.

"We've got to get the troops lined up to make it happen," he said.

Spire said K-State veterinarians are involved in planning the RFID because the department already developed occasionally connected client software, which is similar to the RFID.

He said connected client software data can be entered, and if a truck is not within reach of a tower the data will remain secure until a truck is close to a tower.

Spire said Kansas is one of the leading cattle-producing states with a base number of 1.5 million head and 6.5 million harvested in the state each year. This means 400 to 500 trucks on the road everyday.

Ceremonial hype over, memories emerge

ANTHONY MENDOZA

It's over.

After four years of hype and two weeks of events, the Olympics came to a close Sunday night with the United States winning 103 medals.

Nothing blew up – besides the men's basketball team – and the Games never were threatened by any terrorists groups as was first feared.

Now that the Athens hype machine is complete, let the promotion of the 2008 Olympics begin, but not before we reflect on what happened in these Games.

■ The men's basketball team, made up of professional stars, lost three games in these Olympics.

Prior to this year, the U.S. team had only lost twice in 112 games.

The Dream Team ended up bringing home the bronze, a disappointment by the standards of basketball fans around the world.

■ While the men struggled, the women's basketball team beat Australia for its third straight gold medal by emphasizing what the men lacked: team play and a solid base of players who compete year in and year out for their country.

■ The decline of U.S. boxing continued in these Games as only one fighter – light heavy-weight Andre Ward – won the gold medal. It was the first gold in boxing for the United States in eight years.

This used to be our sport, with names like Holyfield, De La Hoya, Tyson, Bowe and Jones Jr.

■ No Lance Armstrong, no problem. The U.S. cycling team won four medals on the road led by Tyler Hamilton's gold medal in the time trial.

■ As for a sport we only care about every four years – gymnastics – Carly Patterson became the first individual to capture the women's all-around title since Mary Lou Retton in 1984.

Paul Hamm completed the all-around American sweep in gymnastics, coming back from 12th place to win the first-ever U.S. men's overall title, but not without controversy.

South Korea protested the low start value on a parallel bars routine by Yang Tae Young.

The International Gymnastics Federation called the case closed, but sent a letter to Hamm through the U.S. Olympic Committee in an attempt to convince him to hand over the gold to Tae Young.

■ The story on the soccer field this year was the Iraqi men's run for the gold medal.

The Iraqis finished fourth, but the women's U.S. team stole the spotlight back, winning the gold again as the international careers of Mia Hamm, Julie Foudy and Joy Fawcett ended on a high note.

■ Who needs a baseball team from America to qualify for the Olympics when you have a softball juggernaut?

The Americans went undefeated on the way to gold, allowing only 18 hits in 56 innings and outscoring their opponents 51-1.

■ Michael Phelps may not have surpassed Mark Spitz's Olympic record of seven gold medals, but he did win eight total medals – six of them gold leading the swimming team to 28 total medals.

The pressure to win eight gold medals will be on again for Phelps in four years.

■ The lead story on the track was Marion Jones and the BALCO investigation, but the Americans managed to step out from behind the cloud of controversy.

The U.S. won 25 medals in track and field – eight gold – including the crowning of Justin Gatlin as "the fastest man in the

Sailing club promotes safety education

By Kelly Olson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If you go
Sailing club meeting

When: 8 tonight
Where: Big 12 room, K-State Student Union

The sailing club might be small in numbers, but that has not taken away from the positive experiences the club has given its members.

Peter Lundquist, senior in agronomy and biochemistry, said the 10-member club – based out of Blue Valley Yacht Club – is laid-back. No one is required to come to all the practices and members can learn at their own pace.

"Our focus is largely to educate members about sailing and to prepare them to sail well and safely. We schedule practices several times a week, but members come as often as they can or desire to," he said.

Lundquist, commodore of the club, said there have been many benefits of being a member of the club.

"I have been able to meet many great people who I would not have been able to meet otherwise. By serving as president, I have been learning skills for leadership, responsibility, and ability to work with many people for a common goal," he said.

Anyone wanting to join the club can do so by participating in at least one work day a semester and paying the $20 dues.

Lundquist said he encourages all students to participate.

"Learning to sail is a challenge, but it is so rewarding as the concepts come together and you improve," he said. "As I have been learning to sail, I have been developing perseverance, because nothing I have learned has come naturally to me. I've worked hard to learn it."

Many of the members said they joined because they sailed with their family as a child and wanted to continue.

Steven Baker, junior in mechanical engineering and treasurer of the club, said he had a catamaran that his father was tired of paying to keep at a lake, so they donated it to the sailing club.

"I decided to join so I could continue sailing my boat and learn about others," he said.

He said learning to sail can be both easy and hard, and the learning will never stop.

"You will always be learning how to become a better sailor. It's a great way to get students' minds off of school and being on the water is a great stress reliever and fun, too," he said.

Catherine Wisian, senior in landscape architecture, also sailed with her family as a child, but was never allowed to do anything hands-on with the boat.

She said the informational meeting was what got her hooked.

Wisian said for those who do not know much about sailing, the best thing is the feeling a person gets while on the boat.

"When you're going really fast over the water without an engine going, it's the coolest feeling," she said.

Club members said they are excited to gain new members, this year and are ready to start a new season.

"The people who aren't afraid of getting a little dirty and having fun under the sun with some really cool people should join the club," Wisian said.

Senior Linzi Hauldren, co-captain of the women's rowing team doesn't voice her leadership; instead, she shows it to her teammates.

Assistant Coach Paula Donald said Hauldren has shown great dedication to the sport in her four years as a Wildcat.

Hauldren joined the women's rowing team her freshman year as a walk-on. She never played sports in high school but decided to try rowing in college because it looked interesting.

Sweeney and Donald said Hauldren is an asset to the team, showing strength on the water and in the classroom. "She is a person of character, very responsible and reliable and her teammates know they can count on her," she said.

CFB | Meier to start, offensive starters change

Though there was no surprise at the quarterback position, there was a shakeup at wide receiver on the updated K-State football depth chart released Monday.

As expected, sophomore quarterback Dylan Meier is slotted to start over sophomore transfer Allen Webb Saturday against Western Kentucky at KSU Stadium.

However, Coach Bill Snyder did make depth-chart changes at wide receiver.

Junior-college transfer Yamon Figueiroa took senior Antoine Polite's spot, while sophomore Jermaine Moreira moved ahead of junior Davin Dennis. Dennis is still ahead of senior Tony Madison in the three-wide receiver set.

On the offensive line, junior Michael Weiner has been tapped as departed Chris Boggs's replacement at starting right guard.

As for the defensive side of the ball, only one starting position changed.

Sophomore Quinton Echols bumped senior Andrew Bulman at right tackle.

NBA | Potential jurors in Bryant trial questioned

Prospective jurors in the Kobe Bryant rape case were asked their feelings on racial prejudice, interracial relationships, marital infidelity and justice for the rich and famous in an 82-item questionnaire released Monday.

The potential jurors filled out the surveys Friday, and lawyers began questioning them individually behind closed doors Monday after district judge Terry Ruckriegle rejected a request to let the media listen in.

Ruckriegle said he wanted the prospective jurors to feel they could answer questions about potentially embarrassing topics without scrutiny from the media. He said the prospective jurors' right to privacy and Bryant's right to a fair trial outweigh the First Amendment right of access.

Bryant, 26, who appeared at the courthouse Monday, has pleaded not guilty to felony sexual assault, saying he had consensual sex with a then-19-year-old employee at a Vail-area resort last summer. If convicted, the Los Angeles Lakers star could get four years to life in prison.

MCBB | Vaughan settles in prostitution case

Clyde Vaughan, the former University of Connecticut assistant men's basketball coach, agreed on Monday to perform 10 days of community service and undergo counseling to settle charges of soliciting prostitution and interfering with police.

Vaughan, 42, of Manchester, Conn., entered a conditional plea in Hartford Community Court. If he completes the community service and counseling, the charges will be dismissed.

Vaughan resigned last week following his arrest in a prostitution sting by Hartford police on Aug. 18, and the disclosure that he had been arrested twice before in other states on similar charges.

He was ordered to appear in court again on Sept. 28.

Vaughan, who is married and has custody of his 8-year-old son from his first marriage, was charged with soliciting a prostitute in Long Beach, Calif., and Tampa, Fla., where he previously coached college teams.

NASCAR | Wallace to retire after 2005 season

NASCAR driver Rusty Wallace will retire after the 2005 season, saying he is concerned about getting hurt and wants to leave at the top of his game. His decision was influenced by the death of rival Dale Earnhardt in a Daytona 500 crash in 2001.

The 48-year-old Wallace has won 55 races. He made his NASCAR debut in 1980 and has won almost every major race except the Daytona 500.

Wallace, who drives for Penske Racing South, intends to stay in racing as a team owner and mentor for younger drivers after he retires.

Wallace also plans to do TV commercials tied to his corporate sponsorships with Miller Brewing Co. and other companies.

PARKING | New restrictions to apply during gamedays at KSU Stadium

Cattell said that front yard parking is now permitted if residents have access to their property from the street or if they have access to a four-lane street.

These restrictions are temporary and valid only in the 24 hours of any day during which an intercollegiate football game occurs at KSU Stadium.

"It can be dangerous trying to go east through the streets," Robert Poulson, Manhattan resident, said.

Poulson lives about four blocks west of the stadium and feels the effects of gameday parking.

"It's not a crisis, but there have been some inconveniences," Poulson said. Packed streets simply means extra planning, he said.

"Don't ever come and go at the beginning or end of a game," he said.

Poulson said he anticipates the parking to spread west with the new regulations. With cars lining only one side of the street, people will have to start parking farther away.

Parking around the complex is the best in the Big 12, said Jim Muller, manager of operations for K-State Athletics.

However, the two primary lots are not for everyone, he said. "They're all spoken for by Ahearn and VIP level donors," Muller said.

The rest of the fans can park near the Rec Complex and the grassy area immediately to the west. He said these areas are first come, first serve and

The Cure's latest CD smashes notions

"The Cure"

Album review by Jessica Grant

Sometimes stereotypes are hard to shake. For The Cure, many college students simply regard them as a weird goth band, thanks in part to lead singer Robert Smith's penchant for eye liner and birds-nest hair.

However, while this stereotype may be an accurate description of the aesthetic of the band, it totally neglects the pop sensibility, which is where the band's true brilliance lies. The Cure's 2000 release "Bloodflowers" was poorly received, partially because so many people just weren't interested.

Recently, bands like Interpol, the Rapture and Muse all have cited the Cure as a major influence, and 311 just recently covered "Love Song" off of the Cure's 1989 release "Disintegration." This kind of publicity has led the band to connect with a younger audience and allowed for the Cure to host the Curiosa festival this summer.

"The Cure" is the newest release from the band. This album continues a bizarre pattern set by the band of releasing an album once every four years. "The Cure" also is the first album since their 1979 debut "Three Imaginary Boys" that was not produced by Robert Smith.

The new album was produced by Ross Robinson, also known for his work with Limp Bizkit, Slipknot and At the Drive-In. Robinson may not seem like the obvious choice to produce an album by a band that does not fall into the nu-metal category, but Robinson proves to be a surprising fit.

The songs on "The Cure" are a bit heavier sounding, but the pop sensibility and unquestionably dramatic sound of the Cure remains.

The album kicks off with the song "Lost." The song begins with guitars as heavy as Smith's eyeliner, which create an atmosphere tumultuous and perfect enough for Smith to shout "I can't find myself."

"Lost" may be the quintessential disparaging song by the Cure, but it does not necessarily work to set the stage for a totally depressing album. Instead, "Lost" serves to balance out the passionate love songs that are a staple for the Cure.

"Before Three" is a gentle and upbeat love song where Smith sings, "The happiest day I ever knew/In a sea of gold down next to you." "alt.end" is the other truly notable love song on the album that laments the Scissor Sisters breathes life into glam rock

"Scissor Sisters"

★★★★☆

Album review by Mark Sibilla

There's something happening, and I like it.

The radio actually is playing good music.

Bands such as Modest Mouse finally are getting the attention they deserve and are replacing nu-metal, over-produced R&B and poppy starlets that were killing the music industry.

Music from rock's past that was once looked upon as a guilty pleasure is being revitalized. Bands such as the Scissor Sisters, a quintet hailing from New York City, are resurrecting disco, glam rock and 70's piano rock a la Elton John.

Dressed in clothes that appear to have come from a transvestite's garage sale and named after a lesbian sex position, the Scissor Sisters (four males and one female, each with names such as Ana Matronic, Babydaddy, Paddy Boom, etc.) create a debut of pure, danceable, pop joy.

The record opens with the song, "Laura." It starts with piano pounding out a single chord, and when Jake Shears sings "Come on," he makes it sound a lot like "Chamone!" in an obvious homage to Michael Jackson. The song also leaves room for a swinging sax solo.

"Take Your Mama" works in piano not unlike Elton John, the rocker.

The third track sees the Sisters covering Pink Floyd's "Comfortably Numb." What I thought would have been a travesty turns out to be a thoroughly enjoyable disco romp complete with vocals that would rival the Bee Gees ("I-I-I-I have become comfortably numb").

The best track on the album is "Tits On the Radio." When I hear "There ain't no tits on the radio/Oh no" in a perfect male falsetto, I can't help but crack a huge smile while I'm shaking my ass to the beat.

Even when the band is presenting a heavier subject, they still manage to keep a glimmer of hope within their songs.

The prime example is "Return to Oz," a commentary on the destruction that crystal meth has wrought on the gay community in New York.

Even though the album ends on a somber note, one cannot ignore the perfect dance pop that comes before it.

The Scissor Sisters present their unique pop in such a loving manner that as the listener, you are compelled to smile, sing, and dance along.

KSU Theatre, McCain gear up for coming season

By Kelly Olson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The KSU Theatre Program and McCain Auditorium are gearing up for another season of performances.

Sally Bailey, assistant professor in theater, said theater is important because it you can broaden your communication skills.

"Theater, in general, has helped make me a more open, expressive, confident person," she said. "Theater is all about communicating with the audience and with the other artists you are working with. The more you do it, the more skilled you get at communicating in many different modes: verbally, visually, through movement and non-verbal communication."

The opening performance for the department is "Because-He-Can," a drama written by Arthur Kopit and that originally was called "Y2K."

The play discusses issues affecting victims of internet identity theft. Bailey said there will be faculty and graduate students from the computer science department available to talk after the show about dealing with real-life problems of identity theft via the Internet.

The second production taking place this semester is "Grease," a well-known musical which began on Broadway.

"Grease" is so much fun," said Marci Maullar, managing director of KSU theatre. "We have a great cast and lots planned around it."

Bailey said the good thing about K-State theater is the openness to all students.

"I know that KSU is a very open, supportive, warm theater department which really tries to get its students as many hands-on experiences in as many areas as they are interested in," Bailey said. "The opportunities are there for the taking, if students are willing take the risk to ask, to audition, and to work once they get their initial opportunity."

Tickets can be purchased for one performance, and

Crowe admits to scuffle with personal bodyguard

"Gladiator" star Russell Crowe took the blame for his latest battle — a fight with his own bodyguard — saying it was sparked by a misunderstanding at a party for the cast and crew of a movie he was shooting.

The Oscar-winning actor made headlines in Australia recently by scuffling with Mark "Spud" Carroll, a former rugby league star who now is his bodyguard, in Toronto where Crowe is shooting his latest movie, "The Cinderella Man."

Reports said New Zealand-born Crowe, who engaged in highly publicized brawls before he got married last year, even chomped on Carroll's ear during the fight, but they made up the next day.

Crowe said he had been talking to a young woman at the party, who was a friend of both men.

Carroll approached Crowe and told him how he thought people might perceiving the pair's conversation.

"I thought he was accusing me specifically of something, and I took offense to it," Crowe said in a letter to the Sunday Herald Sun tabloid.

No evidence of hijacking in air disaster

By Maria Danilova
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MOSCOW — Russia's transport minister, citing a "black box" recording from one of two planes that crashed minutes apart last, said Monday there was no evidence of a hijacking attempt or any other disturbance before explosions aboard the jetliners.

The conversation inside the cockpit of the Tu-154 plane indicated the crew was unable to contact traffic controllers and tried to manage the jet for some time after the blast on board.

"The words spoken by the crew members among themselves are (about) work by the crew to save the plane," the minister, Igor Levitin, said.

Also, new details emerged about two Chechen women who are the focus of suspicions that the planes were blown up by terrorists. All 90 people aboard the aircraft were killed.

Gen. Andrei Fetisov, chief of the scientific department at the Federal Security Service, said there was no longer any doubt that "both planes crashed as a result of explosions," the ITAR-Tass news agency reported Monday. He reiterated that traces of the high explosive hexogen were found in the wreckage.

Alexander Blotnitsky | THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
Russian soldiers carry a coffin with the dead body of a victim of the TU-154 passenger jet crash near Glubokoy, a Russian village. "During the investigation of the wreckage of the Tupolev 154, we found traces of explosive material," a spokesman for the FSB intelligence agency was quoted by ITAR-TASS and Interfax news agencies as saying. The crashes of two Russian planes last week killed 90 people, hailing it as a first strike to stop Moscow's fight against separatists in Chechnya.

How the explosive may have been brought on board the planes that took off from Moscow was still unclear, however, and investigators were scraping for clues about Amana Nagayeva and S. Dzhebirkhanova, two Chechen women whose names were listed on tickets for the flights.

The crashes happened just five days before presidential elections in Chechnya, where separatist rebels have been fighting Russian forces for five years. Nagayeva, 30, and Dzhebirkhanova, 37, aroused accident investigators' suspicions because they purchased tickets at the last minute — and because they were the only victims about whom no relatives inquired after news of the crashes.

Sharon calls for one-step evacuation of Gaza Strip

By Mark Lavie
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon wants all 21 Jewish settlements in the Gaza Strip evacuated at the same time instead of in three stages, officials said Monday, reflecting a major shift in tactics in his pullout plan.

Sharon's goal is to prevent drawn-out and violent confrontations between settlers and the security forces, as well as multiple confrontations in his Cabinet.

According to his "unilateral disengagement" plan as approved in June, the Gaza settlements are to be removed in three stages by the end of September 2005. Four small West Bank settlements are also to be evacuated.

Sharon presented the new formula to his Security Cabinet, a forum of senior ministers, on Monday. Dropping the staged pullout of Gaza is meant to stifle criticism and limit armed resistance to what would be the first time Israel has ever removed authorized settlements in the West Bank or Gaza.

Since Sharon first raised the plan in December, settlers have been organizing to resist.

Though most of the 8,000 Gaza settlers are expected to accept compensation or alternative housing and leave quietly, a small, hard core of settlers would likely dig in and try to fend off security forces.

Removing all 21 settlements at once would be practical, political analyst Hanan Crystal said.

"If they do it in stages, the same thousand settlers will run from one place to the next" to resist, he told the Associated Press.

The one-off evacuation also helps Sharon solve political problems. Faced with a Cabinet rebellion, Sharon rammed the plan through in June, but had to agree to additional votes for each stage of the evacuation.

Welfare Minister Zevulun Orlev of the pro-settler National Religious Party said a Security Cabinet vote Monday, authorizing police to handle the actual removal of settlers, still does not obligate the government to evacuate the settlements. "It's all words," Orlev told Army Radio. "We approved all the backdrops, but there is no approval for the performance itself."

Generals in abuse case face disciplinary action

By Robert Burns
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The Abu Ghraib prisoner abuse scandal could effectively end the careers of four Army generals who are linked indirectly to the misconduct but face no criminal charges.

The four are singled out for varying degrees of criticism — mixed with instances of praise — in two comprehensive investigative reports released last week. The investigators conclude that the generals are partly responsible, but not legally culpable, for the abuse last fall.

All four are "essentially finished in the military," even if they are not forced to resign, said Dan Goure, a defense analyst at the Lexington Institute think tank. "At the very minimum you could argue that they lost control" of their subordinates, he said.

The most senior of the four generals, Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez, already has been passed over for promotion to a four-star slot as chief of Southern Command because of an expectation by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld that Sanchez would face trouble in a Senate confirmation hearing.

Sanchez was the top U.S. commander in Iraq until the restoration of Iraqi sovereignty in late June, when he returned to Army 5th Corps headquarters in Germany, where he is the commanding general.

Further complicating his situation is the fact that as 5th Corps commander he would normally be the person to make decisions about pursuing possible criminal charges against soldiers of the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade who are implicated in the latest Army report.

But since his own role in Iraq is under scrutiny, that responsibility may be shifted elsewhere.

Sanchez and his top deputy, Maj. Gen. Walter Wojdakowski, are cited in an Army investigation for failure to "ensure proper staff oversight of detention and interrogation operations" in Iraq, specifically at the Abu Ghraib prison where Iraqi detainees were physically abused and sexually humiliated by military police and intelligence soldiers in the fall of 2003.

That probe was conducted by Maj. Gen. George Fay and focused on the role of the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade at Abu Ghraib, although it also assessed the performance of commanders and senior staff officers higher up the chain of command.

It found no evidence the abuse was carried out under military orders, or in accordance with any Pentagon policy, but rather was attributed to personal misconduct and, in some cases, confusion and inadequate supervision.

Wojdakowski had responsibility for detention operations at Abu Ghraib but was not based there. Separately, the intelligence soldiers who conducted interrogations at Abu Ghraib reported through Sanchez's intelligence chief, Maj. Gen. Barbara Fast.

"These arrangements had the damaging result that no single individual was responsible for overseeing operations at the prison," according to a report by an independent panel of non-government experts, headed by former defense secretary James Schlesinger, also released last week.

Fast, Wojdakowski and Sanchez, as well as Janis Karpinski, the Army Reserve brigadier general who commanded the 800th Military Police Brigade in Iraq, are criticized in both the Fay and Schlesinger reports.

Fast also is praised. The Fay report says she orchestrated a reorganization of the intelligence setup in Iraq after she arrived in July 2003 amid an emerging anti-U.S. insurgency.

"The subsequent successes of this new intelligence architecture created by Maj. Gen. Fast and her team exponentially improved the intelligence process and saved the lives of coalition forces and Iraqi civilians," it said. The organization she set up also led to the capture of key members of the former Saddam Hussein regime and, ultimately, to Saddam's capture in December 2003.

The Schlesinger report says Wojdakowski failed to call for more military police at Abu Ghraib after it became clear more were needed.

It faults Fast for improperly advising Sanchez on operating the interrogation center at Abu Ghraib and for failing to appropriately monitor the activities of the CIA, whose officers participated in some interrogations at the prison and who allegedly persuaded the Army to hold "ghost" detainees without registering them as required by law.

The Schlesinger report blamed Karpinski for leadership failures that "helped set the conditions at the prison which led to the abuses." She failed to ensure that Iraqi prisoners were protected by the Geneva Conventions and failed to deal with ineffective commanders below her. It recommended she be relieved of command and given a letter of reprimand, which would essentially end her career.

Shortly before the Abu Ghraib scandal erupted last spring, the Army announced Fast would take command of Fort Huachuca, Ariz., and its Army Intelligence Center when she returned from Iraq.

However, she has been back since late July and has yet to be installed as commander.

Col. Joseph Curtin, a spokesman at Army headquarters in the Pentagon, said Friday that Fast remains in line for the command but no date has been set for her to assume the post, which is in charge of training in interrogation, counterintelligence and other special skills.

A spokeswoman at Fort Huachuca, Joan Vasey, said Monday that Fast would not comment on the reports and that she still expects to become commander.

Casino creates jobs, tourist draws

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MAYETTA, Kan. — Six years ago, most of the roads at the Potawatomi reservation north of Topeka were either dirt or gravel. The unemployment rate in Jackson County was high, and there wasn't much reason for anyone living outside the county to seek jobs there.

What a difference a casino makes.

Now the state's No. 2 tourist attraction, Harrah's Prairie Band Casino has infused new life into a community where three out of every four members of the tribe had no job two decades ago.

With a work force of more than 1,050, the casino and adjacent hotel had an annual payroll last year of $23 million, and officials believe that will exceed $26 million next year.

A recently completed $55 million expansion of the casino and hotel facilities added 100 jobs.

The average salary is $14 an hour, and 75 percent of the employees are full time. The county's jobless rate has shrunk to 6.4 percent, and 2000 census figures show 1,400 people commute into the county to work, compared with 400 in 1990.

"Almost half of our employees come from the Topeka area," said Patrick Browne, general manager of the casino. "The surrounding communities of Hoyt, Mayetta and Holton make up most of the other half."

Of the 4,900 members of the tribe, more than 100 work in the casino and hotel — including 40 hired within the past year.

The casino is the county's biggest employer, followed by the tribal government with 325 employees.

"Most of those jobs were created since the casino opened," said Jonathan Wimer, director of the Jackson County Development Corp.

Zach Pahmahmie, chairman of the Prairie Band Potawatomi

Nation, said proceeds from the casino have funded such community resources as the Elder Center, fire department, police department, buffalo herd and Prairie People's Park.

Gambling profits have been used to help the tribe's members earn college degrees, Pahmahmie said.

The casino once was the state's top tourist attraction, but the opening of Cabela's outdoor superstore in Kansas City, dropped Harrah's to No. 2. The casino had 1.4 million visitors in 2003, and Brown thinks that number could hit 2 million by next year.

The casino's customer base is age 45 to 65 and has higher than average disposable income.

Other businesses also hope to benefit from the increased traffic around the casino. Wimer said the number of calls from people inquiring about starting a business in the area has increased quite a bit this year.

One of Hauldren's defining characteristics is her leadership by example, her coaches said.

"She has a great work ethic and leads by example. She is always willing to put in extra time to help make herself and her team better," Donald said.

"She does the little things to help the team grow and does a good job of noticing who's struggling and helps encourage them," she said.

Sweeney said Hauldren's leadership is reflected in the team.

"She is a co-captain this year, and the team picks which girls get those positions," he said.

"I was very comfortable putting her in the varsity boat — there were no questions, she earned her place," he said.

Hauldren said improvement is her main goal to help keep the team going in the right direction.

The team is still young, but she said she hopes to keep them on the right track with her leadership.

Junior Megan Hauver said Hauldren is a positive, encouraging leader.

"She is easy to talk to and go to with concerns, and she pushes you to work hard,"

Hauver said.

This is Hauldren and Hauver's third season as teammates.

Not only is Hauldren a role model for the team, she also brings a competitive edge to the sport, Hauver said.

"I am always trying to compete with her and get better," Hauver said.

Hauldren enjoys being on the team and said its effect on her personally has been huge.

"Rowing is a life changing thing, it affects you physically, mentally, emotionally, spiritually, everything. If it wasn't for my teammates, I wouldn't have made it this far," she said.

world" with his win in the 100 meters.

An Olympics that came with huge question marks about its facilities and lure to the world came off unscathed.

What will we remember most about these games — the men's basketball team winning the bronze, softball rolling through their opponents, Phelps falling short of Spitz's record or gymnastics winning both individual crowns in men's and women's competition?

No, the thing we will remember most is the last day of competition, the marathon and the guy in the kilt and beret coming out of the crowd and attacking the men's lead runner who ended finishing with the bronze.

There's nothing like the X-Games invading the Olympics to tarnish what had been two weeks of great competition without incident.

"bright big beautiful world." This song is poppy enough to be a single and combined with "Before Three," Smith proves that even after twenty-plus years, he is not too jaded to fall in love.

The mentionable pop songs are the album's first single, "The End of the World" and "(I don't know what's going) on."

While the songs are wholly different pop pieces, they both prove that The Cure still is capable of writing brilliant songs that appeal to a wide audience.

The world may not have been listening in 2000, but with the release of an album as solid as "The Cure," you can bet people will take notice.

BLUEMONT | High-density housing scheduled for completion in January

"The cost of construction materials keep going up, and the new complexes have to raise the rent," he said. "The house units will follow along and also raise prices, even though they don't have new materials to pay for. So it's not going to affect my job."

Bernard Irvine, owner of the complex at 1020 Bluemont Ave., said he is gearing his complex toward student housing.

"We believe it will appeal to students because of its central location," he said. "It's right by the campus and Aggieville."

Irvine said he purchased the house at 1020 Bluemont Ave. with demolition and rebuilding in mind.

The complex is scheduled to be finished by Jan. 1, 2005.

Roy Brunk of Doug Piper Construction saws wood for apartments being built on Bluemont Avenue. Brunk and a crew of five workers are doing the framework on the house before another crew completes the shingles and brick.

SPIES | Israeli embassy worker cited as espionage suspect

Iranian affairs who works in a Pentagon office lead by Douglas Feith, the undersecretary for policy. Feith has been accused by Democrats of seeking to manipulate intelligence to help make the case for going to war in Iraq. Congressional investigations have found no evidence of that.

The Israeli diplomat was identified as Naor Gilon, head of the political department at the Israeli Embassy in Washington, and a specialist on Iran's nuclear weapons program. Shalom did not mention Gilon by name, but when asked about contacts between Gilon and Franklin, he did not deny they had taken place.

The Israeli daily Maariv on Monday quoted Gilon as saying he did nothing wrong. "My hands are clean. I have nothing to hide. I acted according to the regulations," Gilon said.

The diplomat told Maariv he was concerned as a result of the reports, he won't be able to continue working in Washington.

"Now, people will be scared to talk to me," the newspaper quoted him as saying.

Newsweek magazine reported in this week's edition that more than a year ago, the FBI was monitoring a meeting between an Israeli Embassy official, believed to be Gilon, and a representative of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, the main Israeli lobbying group in Washington.

President, supporters back policies

By David Esposito
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Republican National Convention co-stars Laura Bush and Arnold Schwarzenegger commended President Bush to the country Tuesday for four more years in office. "I believe in this president," Schwarzenegger said in prepared remarks that blended praise for Bush with a pledge to immigrants that the party will welcome them.

"We Republicans admire your ambition. We encourage your dreams. We believe in your future," said the body builder-turned-movie star and politician.

Bush, locked in a tight re-election race, campaigned across three battleground states during the day.

He worked to extinguish a convention-week controversy of his own making.

"In this different kind of war, we may never sit down at a peace table. But make no mistake about it, we are winning, and we will win" the war on terror, he told an American Legion convention in Tennessee, one day after saying he didn't think victory would be possible.

"I probably needed to be more articulate," he conceded in a radio interview with conservative talk-show host Rush Limbaugh.

Bush's Democratic rival, Sen. John Kerry, was at home in Nantucket, Mass., meeting with senior aides to discuss the shape of his fall campaign for the White House.

A poll by The Washington Post showed the race to be a dead heat, 48 percent apiece, but found that the president is moving ahead of his rival on national security issues and pulling into a virtual tie on handling of the economy.

Meningitis vaccine in demand

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Health officials warned students about meningitis, and students have responded.

Lafene Health Center has been flooded with students requesting meningitis vaccines, giving 219 shots in July and August — double the 2003 total.

"We've tried to maneuver our staff so that we can fit students in," said Carol Kennedy, director of health promotion and education.

In order to accommodate students, Lafene is offering meningitis vaccinations at the residence halls on Sept. 9 and 16. Students must reserve their vaccine ahead of time, which costs $65.

"We have to order the vaccine," Dr. Jay Reppert, Lafene medical director, said. "It's expensive, so we don't keep a lot in stock."

Reppert said students living in residence halls are at the highest risk, while older students living off-campus are not as likely to contract the disease.

A taste of K-State

Beverage goes nationwide

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A beverage created in Manhattan is about to go national.

Cal-C, a product owned by NutriJoy and researched by K-State, started with just two stores and now appears in 400, netting millions.

Brice Libel, brand manager, said test markets include the Midwest, Northwest and Arizona regions.

"We are not there yet, but almost in 200 Safeways. That's our national test there," Libel said. "In September, we have the go ahead to go in 70 or 80 Wal-Mart Supercenters in this Midwest region."

"I wouldn't call us a national brand yet, but that's what we are working toward."

Cal-C is a calcium-rich drink that is a blend of skim milk and fruit juice. One 16-oz. bottle of the drink has the calcium equivalent of four glasses of milk — the recommended daily intake.

Cal-C was born in 2001, with technology donated to K-State by Procter and Gamble.

The drink was first sold at the Cat's Den in the K-State Student Union. A bottle today sells for $1.26.

Jeb Hoverter, senior in marketing and NutriJoy employee, said the bottle size was reduced from 20 ounces to 16 as well as new labels are being developed to prepare for the company's expansion.

"We also did some new labeling so the package looks completely different — much more attractive and appealing to the consumer. Everyone in Manhattan should have the new bottles by now."

Cal-C comes in three flavors — strawberry-citrus, peach mango and orange tangerine. There is also an all-natural line with no artificial flavors, which comes in apple-mango, grape-cranberry and peach tropic flavors.

But changing labels and adding flavors doesn't ensure a successful national product.

"You have to prove yourself," Libel said.

"You can be in the market and prove you are a good brand that will have sales, and you will get their attention. Where we have had success is people who try the product — the people in those companies, like

City police pursuing rape cases

By Annette Lawless
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Riley County Police Department has been investigating reoccurring rapes in the Manhattan area.

"The last reported rape for the City of Manhattan was in June," said Capt. Gary Grubbs, commander of the criminal investigation unit.

On June 14, a woman was raped in her Northwest Manhattan apartment complex by an assailant unknown to the woman.

The suspect, who was described as a white male, about 5 feet 11 inches tall and weighing approximately 170 pounds, is believed to have entered the apartment through the balcony while the victim was alone.

This incident was strikingly similar to a number of other rapes in apartment complexes in the same part of town over the past few years, Grubbs said. "They are happening in the northwest portion of Manhattan," Grubbs said. "The victims are women between the ages of 18 to 27."

Napster, Vanderbilt create music-sharing program

ARTICLES TAKEN FROM COPYBOX.COM

NAPSTER IN NASHVILLE

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Students soon will have a cheap way of downloading music without having to resort to illegal piracy.

Vanderbilt University teamed up with Napster this semester to introduce VUMix, a program students may use to obtain and share music.

Starting Oct. 1, all undergraduate, graduate and professional students with Windows PC operating systems will have the opportunity to subscribe to VUMix service and download full-length songs, officials said.

Senior Paige Thompson said she is excited to use VUMix.

Thompson, her iPod always by her side, shares a common bond with many college students — a love for all the latest and greatest music. She said she once used Napster to download free MP3s to her music library; she then used Kazaa to download free songs when Napster was overhauled.

Subscription fees for VUMix will be a discounted $16 for the academic year or $2 per month, as opposed to the regular Napster subscription price of $9.95 a month. For an additional fee students may burn or transfer songs to mp3 players or a CD for 99 cents a song or $9.95 per album.

THE NEED FOR SPEED

COLUMBUS, Ohio — The Ohio State Buckeye Bullet is on its way home from the Bonneville Salt Flats in Utah after attempting to break its own national speed record. Last week's annual Speed Week saw Ohio State University students try to surpass their old mark of 257 mph.

Driven by Roger Schroer, the machine reached speeds of 308.317 mph in a qualifying timed mile on Aug. 16, which is the fastest timed mile ever recorded.

After its 300-mph first run, the Bullet encountered a mechanical problem.

The differential was in need of a replacement, and the part had to be shipped in from the United Kingdom, adviser Giorgio Rizzoni said. The malfunction forced the crew to end the run.

Rizzoni said the Bullet is one of only 54 other teams to break the 300-mph barrier and the first-ever electric vehicle to do so.

"For the first time ever in history, someone in an electric automobile went over 300 miles per hour," Rizzoni said. "That someone was from Ohio State University."

The car was built and is maintained by a team of graduate and undergraduate students in engineering.

The all-electric vehicle is 31 feet long, two feet tall and 30 inches wide.

PEEPING TOM

MORGANTOWN, W.Va. — West Virginia University Department of Public Safety officers are on the hunt for a man who has been assaulting female students on campus.

Two female students reported to The Daily Athenaeum that a man had followed them to their classes and homes taking photos under their skirts. One of those students has reported this information to DPS.

One incident occurred at 4 p.m. Monday near the Beechurst Personal Rapid Transit station. The other incident occurred at about 5 p.m. Wednesday on North High Street.

"It's scary that this happened in broad daylight right on campus," one of the women said.

Both women said the man had followed them down the street directing a disposable camera up their skirts.

When they noticed the man he asked them if he could take a picture of their faces, while continuing to shoot pictures.

Both females also reported the man was persistent and aggressive.

"He would not stop until I called 911," one female said. "Then when he heard me talking to the police he took off toward downtown Morgantown."

The women described the man as a Caucasian in his mid-20s, with a fair complexion and a goatee. He was reportedly wearing a white T-shirt with blue jeans and a baseball cap.

PROSTITUTION DISCUSSION

BERKELEY, Calif. — Met by dozens of protesters, activists from around the country gathered Monday at the Julia Morgan Theater in Berkeley on Monday to persuade residents to vote against a November ballot measure that would decriminalize prostitution.

Measure Q, also known as "Angel's Initiative," would stop Berkeley from labeling prostitution as a crime, as it currently is under state law. Berkeley police also would make enforcement of prostitution laws their lowest priority.

In the conference, sponsored by the organization Prostitution Research and Education, speakers said the provisions in the measure would worsen conditions for prostitutes.

"If you take away the only controls that keep it undesirable — the police — then the situation goes wild," said Mama Tere Strickland, a speaker at the conference. "It's the legitimization of the subgroups — the pimps and johns."

Opponents of the measure said they feared steering police away from prostitution could attract more prostitution in the city.

"There would be a flood of sex industries coming into Berkeley," said Diana Cababin, a local women's rights activist.

SGA reviews electoral issues

Senators discuss appeal, voting processes

Stephanie Swoboda
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Last year's election controversies have left Student Governing Association members questioning the way they run elections.

"After the past election, a lot of things were not defined that should have been defined to help the process run smoothly," said Sarah Laib, junior in speech and chair of the Senate Operations Committee.

Committee members are reviewing problems such as wireless voting, polling places and an appeal process. For now, they are concentrating on the definitions of the Elections Regulations Code.

Active campaigning is one such definition. The committee wanted to change the regulations to match those used with credit card companies visiting campus.

"They have a broader latitude than we would give people running for election, because campaign workers aren't allowed to initiate interaction," David McCandless, senior in political science, said.

Another problem the committee is trying to solve is the write-in candidate policy. According to current policy, if a candidate fails to meet one of the requirements necessary to be an official candidate on the ballot, they can easily be written in to win a position.

"You can be written in, even if thrown off the original ballot," said Nick Levendofsky, freshman in agricultural communications and journalism.

Most often such violations occur when candidates fail to file the expense report, which is a major offense, according to Elections Regulations.

Many current senators have slipped through this loophole, and the committee is updating regulations to put a stop to these and other discrepancies in the regulations.

"I hope we can solve future problems, but it is by all means not fool proof," Laib said.

TO THE POINT

Precautionary steps can help ensure safety

Although the rapes of the past months may seem distant, students should keep in mind that the person who is responsible has not been caught.

Students can help ensure their own safety by securing their homes or going out at night in groups.

Simple steps such as locking all outside doors, including garage and balcony doors, and jogging with a companion can be enough to deter would-be attackers.

Additionally, students can make better use of services offered by the university and campus police to protect themselves when walking home at night. Such steps, while seemingly simple, can help solidify one's safety at night or any other time of day.

While the rapes over the summer have received a significant amount of attention, students should also remember that most rapes are committed by persons known to the victim and alcohol is often a factor.

The bottom line is that Manhattan, while small and peaceful, is not always the safe place we wish it was.

We must keep safety in mind, especially in light of the rise in rapes this past summer. The Riley County Police Department and KSU Police Department do the best they can, but we are the first line of defense in protecting ourselves.

THURSDAY'S OPINIONS

James Hurla discusses the Republican National Convention.

Chance York considers online dating.

CHANCE YORK

Rebels without cause

Protests disrupt lives of New Yorkers with noise, excessive arrests

The right to freedom of speech, to assemble and to petition the government is vital to this nation. Without First Amendment protections, America wouldn't be America.

LOGAN ADAMS

That being said, the protesters in New York who have a problem with the war in Iraq, the Republican party or sliced bread need to rethink this whole strategy of walk in big groups, yelling loudly and waving big signs.

They're alienating, well, just about everybody.

After all, are New Yorkers going to love them and their beliefs after countless blocks of city streets are cordoned off, so they may express their great distaste for whatever's got their hemp underwear in a bind this time?

The police must love them, especially when the New York Civil Liberties Union and other groups held meetings that began with "what your rights as a demonstrator are" and stopped just short of filing claims of police abuse in advance, so they wouldn't have to do any more paper-work.

That's right, badmouth the people who are trying to protect you from terrorism, counter-protesters and God knows what else.

What's worse is they couldn't even wait for the convention to start; instead, they began before the people they were protesting actually showed up.

When the demonstrators wound around the building Sunday in a march organized by the group "United for Peace and Justice," there was little more in there than workmen and members of the media.

What I really want to know is who is "United for Peace and Justice." They don't tell you that piece of information. Perhaps we're supposed to guess?

For all we know, it's "people who needed more love as children" or "bed-wetters" who have united for peace and justice. Good for them—maybe they can hug each other and have group therapy while they march.

At least they'll have plenty of actors to keep them company.

Actress Rosario Dawson was arrested Sunday while making a movie in the middle of the protests.

"We are the majority. A majority of this country opposes this war... a majority of this country never voted for this administration," said Michael Moore.

Someone needs to explain to Mike that 400,000 angry people no doubt an inflated number—is not a majority of the population of New York City, let alone the whole country.

There are so many people working in office buildings in that city, you could have 400,000 angry people in the streets just by putting stink bombs in a couple dozen of their ventilation systems.

You'd think a lesson would have been learned by now, however. Hundreds of thousands, maybe millions, protested in major cities all over the world in hopes of preventing the war, and we all know exactly how successful their interpretive dancing and group chanting were.

More bad news: the left no longer holds the monopoly on this worthless tactic. Counter-protesting is fast becoming a rite of passage among Republican youths. Seen "Alien vs. Predator"? It's that sorta thing.

A softer approach in the future definitely would help. Maybe instead of lecturing and screaming, they could bathe, then walk around, greet others with a smile and ask if anyone wanted to discuss the war or the Republicans or sliced bread.

Of course, they could just vote like everyone else. Or are they the "majority" after all?

Tolerance for student-parents on campus necessary

I don't like children. I don't want children. I know most, if not all of you are thinking, "Never?"

The answer is yes, never. Luckily, my husband feels the same way.

I do what I can to avoid them. I sit as far away as possible from them in restaurants. If there is one of the screaming variety in the aisle, and I need something from at the grocery store, I will come back later.

One of the few places I felt I could go that would be child-free, besides my home, was school. What a fool I was.

Make no mistake about it, I feel nothing but sympathy for these poor mothers and fathers who bring their children to school.

It is very easy to see a parent with their small child in the library and be angry with them. I heard a screaming child from across the library a few times and thought, "What the hell are they thinking, bringing a kid in here?" But, we must be reasonable.

Stop and think. Would that parent willingly bring their child to campus if they didn't have to? The answer is most likely "no."

These parents, in an effort to further educate themselves, must do what they can to juggle family life and school. Sometimes that gets a little tricky.

I've never had to try and find a babysitter. From what I hear, it's difficult to do on short notice.

Imagine yourself the parent of a three year old. You are sans babysitter. You are also sans computer, because you are a College student with a three-year old. You need to get to Hale Library as soon as possible.

What do you do? Your education depends on your ability to do well in your classes. So you haul your kid to school.

It's easy to imagine.

I have seen some of these parents with their children in the library. They do not look happy. They look angry and embarrassed, because they know what you're thinking. But they don't have a choice.

However, there are some instances in which you have the right to be angry with the parents who bring their kids to school.

If their child is screaming, crying, or throwing things and the parent ignores the child and/or does not take the child outside until they calm down, by all means be angry.

If their child complains loudly that he or she is bored (what are the odds?), and the parent smacks them and goes back to work, by all means be angry (scarily enough, I've seen this happen.)

If you are sleeping on a couch in Hale Library and are perturbed that a laughing toddler has just disturbed your nap, you do not have the right to be angry. You were sleeping, not studying.

Likewise if you're on your cell phone.

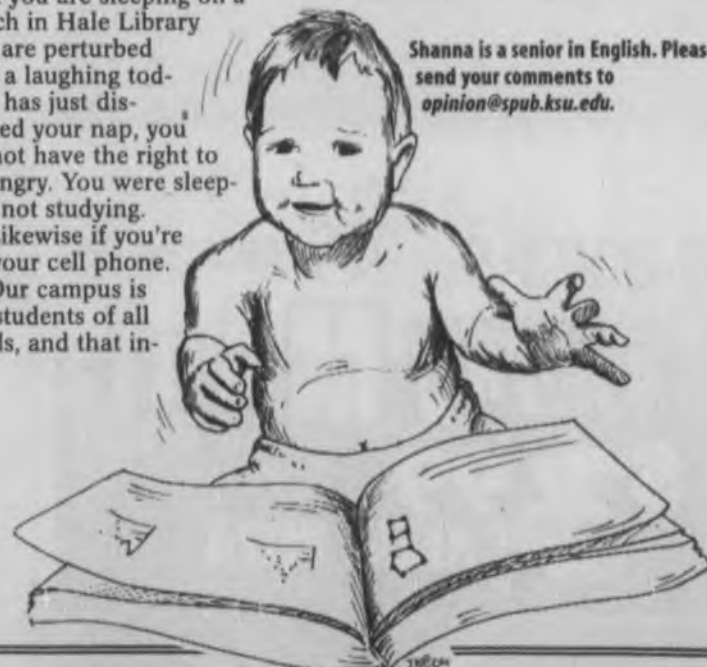

Our campus is for students of all kinds, and that includes parents.

Those of us who do not have children need to keep in mind that we can study virtually anywhere at just about anytime. Parents can't.

So the next time you hear a screaming kid in Hale or anywhere else on campus remember:

You can get away from it. Their mother or father can't.

City wants to 'wow' visitors

Committee discusses coming tourism features

By Joanna Rubick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Attractions Committee for downtown redevelopment can begin putting the "wow factor" into new city attractions.

The committee was granted permission Tuesday night at the City Commission work session to form a preliminary draft application for state-funded Sales Tax Revenue bonds, or STAR bonds.

Canyon Research is working with the Attractions Committee to come up with the first draft, Jason Hilgers, assistant city manager, said.

Hilgers said they are trying to come up with features that will attract visitors.

"A lot of that 'wow factor' has been in the architecture, but we think the components itself will be a 'wow factor,'" he said.

Because of K-State sports and other features in Manhattan, there are varieties of visitors in the area, he said.

"People are coming into Manhattan not only from the region, not only from outside the region, but from other states as well," Hilgers said.

Two of the main features of plans for downtown redevelopment are a Prairie Discovery Center, which will be a museum about the prairie, and a permanent exhibition hall.

The hall may feature an elevator ride that lasts 10 to 15 minutes and gives presentations about various subjects, Hilgers said.

"If you are interested in the military, that's what that's about. If you are interested in Native Americans, that's what that's about," he said.

Possible other features would include a permanent Smithsonian exhibit.

"They're very interested in Manhattan in being the home for that exhibit," Hilgers said. "We're definitely at the top of the list."

Some concerns were raised about the "wow factor" of the prairie museum.

"Grass is just grass to most bland people like me," Commissioner Mark Hatesohl said. "I want something that will rise above others."

But because of a 2003 amendment, however, the STAR bonds only fund buildings, not the interior objects, City Manager Ron Fehr said.

"It would not pay for anything that is moveable to other exhibits," he said.

Commissioners said they still are financially wary of the redevelopment plan.

"I'm still not comfortable," Mayor Brad Everett said. "I can't say that I'm willing to go forward on something that I'm not 100 percent sold on."

However, commissioners were not willing to put a hold on the project.

"I'm not going to step in the way of all this progress, but we as city commissioners need to be careful with the steps we take," Commissioner Ed Klimek said.

Hatesohl said changes can be made along the process.

"We just need to keep this process moving and make adjustments as we go," he said.

ICAT changes offer incentives for football fans

ICAT fans cheer after a K-State touchdown last season against Colorado. Students who purchased ICAT tickets for this season can win free ICAT tickets for next year.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Free tickets, free pizza and lots of purple are the new defining characteristics of ICAT.

ICAT – which now stands for Involved CAT – is a student group based in the athletic department. This summer, changes were made to help boost Wildcat spirit and sporting event attendance.

Now, students who purchased ICAT tickets for the 2004-05 season have the opportunity to win free ICAT tickets for next year.

For each home sporting event ICAT ticket holders attend, they receive a stamp on their shirt from the athletic department staff. The stamps will be distributed at the following athletic events: volleyball, football, basketball, baseball, rowing, tennis, track, golf and equestrian.

"It's kind of like a passport," ICAT sponsor Melynda Stein said. "At each event, you get a Powercat stamp on your shirt."

At the end of the year, students with stamped ICAT shirts can take those shirts to the athletic office, and whoever has the most stamps will win ICAT combination football and basketball or young alumni tickets for the 2005-2006 season.

"ICAT is a special student group, and we want to reward them for supporting our teams," Stein said.

CFB | Oklahoma, Nebraska tickets sold out

Tickets for the Oklahoma and Nebraska home football games are sold out, K-State officials announced Monday.

Several hundred ticket orders could not be accommodated due to high demand. The K-State Ticket Office will notify fans whose orders could not be filled.

Donors and season ticket holders were given top priority in purchasing tickets.

K-State officials announced last week that its allotment of around 9,000 student season tickets were sold out as well.

Individuals can still purchase single-game tickets for the Western Kentucky, Fresno State and Louisiana-Lafayette non-conference games at $35 apiece. Tickets for home contests against Texas Tech and Iowa State are $50.

K-State opens the season against Western Kentucky at 6:10 p.m. Saturday at KSU Stadium.

NBA | Bryant prosecutors concerned over questioning

The judge in the Kobe Bryant sexual assault case said Tuesday he would question some jurors in open court about their opinions in the case, despite prosecutors' concerns that doing so might unfairly influence other potential panelists.

Prosecutor Ingrid Bakke said those with a strong opinion on Bryant's guilt or innocence based on that kind of information should be questioned only behind closed doors. Open-court questioning should be conducted as long as the queries don't delve into information behind a person's opinions, she said.

District Judge Terry Ruckriegle said although he was aware of the prosecutor's concerns, he was still bound to conduct some questioning in open court. Jurors are instructed to reach a verdict based only on evidence presented in court, something the judge called "a monumental task in this case."

Jury selection will be private until at least Wednesday, when reporters will be able to watch and listen through closed-circuit television. By then, the jury pool will likely have been whittled considerably. Opening statements are expected Sept. 7.

MCBB | Knight television deal in the works

The life and times of Bob Knight could soon be right inside America's living rooms.

The fiery Texas Tech coach met with television officials last month in Los Angeles and gave his approval for a sitcom deal. CBS and Paramount Television are exploring the development of a half-hour comedy that could run by next year.

Knight, 63, would serve as a consultant and said he might make guest appearances.

The next step is for a writer to come to Lubbock to spend time getting to know Knight at work and at home.

When the script is written, DeKoven will take it to CBS, which will decide whether to make it a pilot.

John Wentworth, executive vice president of marketing and media for Paramount Television, said the show would possibly be ready to run in September 2005.

NFL | Willis, Clausen cut from Chiefs active roster

Guard Donald Willis was placed on the physically-unable-to-perform list Tuesday by the Kansas City Chiefs while rookie quarterback Casey Clausen was waived.

Altogether, the Chiefs made seven transactions to reduce their roster to 76 players.

Every NFL team has to get to a 53-man roster by Sunday. On Sept. 6, they can create an eight-man practice squad.

The 6-3, 325-pound Willis has appeared in 63 games, including six starts, in his seven-year NFL career.

Clausen was a four-year starter at Tennessee who started 44 games for Volunteers and completed 775 of 1270 passes for 9,707 yards and 75 touchdowns, second in the school's career list only to Peyton Manning.

Volleyball team won't disappoint

MICHAEL ASHFORD

There is a sports dynasty being built in Manhattan.

This team has had many successful seasons in the past decade.

It won its first Big 12 Championship last year in dominating fashion.

They come into the 2004 season with several returnees at key positions.

This team is starting to have the look of an elite, national powerhouse.

You probably think I'm talking about Coach Bill Snyder's football team, right?

Wrong.

How about Coach Deb Patterson's women's basketball team?

Nope.

Try Coach Suzie Fritz's 14th-ranked volleyball team.

That's right, K-State has a dominating team making its home in Ahearn Field House.

Coming off a 30-5 record and a trip to the NCAA Sweet Sixteen last year, the volleyball team is back and looking as formidable as ever.

With returning seniors in All-Big 12 setter Gabby Guerre, Vali "the Hungarian Hammer" Hejjas, Lisa Martin and Michaela Franklin, the Wildcats return with veteran firepower and are primed to repeat as Big 12 Champions.

Not only is the team good, but they are fun to watch.

These women possess an awesome combination of power, strength and enthusiasm that makes their matches a thrill to watch.

Of course, all of the success starts at the top.

Fritz, entering her fourth year of leading the Wildcats, is one of the best coaches in the game.

The Wildcats have continuously gotten better, and Fritz is the one to thank.

She has built a championship-winning program in the Big 12, arguably the nation's toughest conference.

Her teams always play with a high level of energy, enthusiasm and emotion that keep the fans coming back for more year after year.

We as students have an unbelievable opportunity to see elite college athletes tear up the court and opposing teams right here on campus in a building steeped in tradition.

So get out to Ahearn Field House tonight and every night this fall when the volleyball team is playing.

You won't be disappointed.

The Wildcats start the year ranked 14th in the nation in the USA Today/CSTV Poll – their highest pre-season ranking ever.

Coach Suzie Fritz said she is pleased with her team's progress thus far in the season, but the improvement needs to continue on both sides of the ball.

"I think we're a better team now than we were three weeks ago in a lot of different aspects," she said. "Defensively, I like the things we're doing. I think we're serving very aggressively and making a good effort to dig and keep balls in play and make the rallies last a little bit longer."

The defending Big 12 Conference champion Wildcats are led into the season by senior preseason All-Big 12 setter Gabby Guerre and senior outside hitter Vali Hejjas, the 2003 Big 12 Newcomer of the Year.

K-State faces a squad returning all six starters and a libero and is the pre-season pick to win the Mid-Continent Conference.

The Golden Eagles feature all-league defensive specialist/libero Becky Dreher, who was one of the nation's leaders in digs per game last year.

Fritz said defense is a top priority heading into the game.

Anatomy of entertainment

Local band members devote many hours of preparation to concerts

By Will Klusener
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The life of a hard rocker isn't all glitz and glamour.

Band members often get to attend wild after-show parties and drink off of free bar tabs, but there are many more aspects involved in producing a show.

Dean Linton, drummer for Placate, said many of the problems bands face occur during the show itself. He said wiring can cause short circuits, and musicians' instruments sometimes break. This, he said, is the biggest problem.

"Problems can occur at any time," Linton said. "That's probably the hardest part. But if you're well prepared, most problems can be avoided."

J.D. Hillen, junior in digital art and vocalist for local band Copus, said he thinks getting the band members to agree often can be difficult as well.

"There are little things that we often don't agree on, like how a certain chord progression should go," Hillen said. "We argue, but we always manage to work it out."

Working out separate schedules and finding practice time are the hardest parts of playing in a band, Jake Holz, lead singer for Genepool, said.

"The hardest part is getting all the members together and turning it into one thing," Holz said. "It's tough to work around everyone's schedules and get a regular practice time."

Travis "Trapper" Edwards, former front man of the Chicago Seven and current booking agent/promoter for PJ's Restaurant and Pub, said he feels the entire process can be a hassle.

"Probably everything is difficult," Edwards said. "From booking a show, to promotion, to getting people to come. It's like a job. There are little things to consider all over."

It's not as easy to book a show as one might think, Erik Swanson, bass player for Placate, said. He said it can involve hours on the phone and sending out countless e-mails.

"Usually we book a show a month or two in advance, so it gives us lots of time to prepare," Swanson said. "We book shows either by phone or by e-mail."

Holz said communication with the venue is especially important.

"You have to call every club in town numerous times, at least the ones that you know rock," Holz said. "When you finally get a show, you have to confirm it later on. We like to play pretty much anywhere that rocks from coast to coast. We don't care where or when or how we get 'er done."

Edwards said practicing frequently is vital to a band's performance level. The more they practice, the better they become, he said.

"You have to practice everyday, not just as a band, but as an individual," Edwards said. "As your personal skills as a musician increase, the band's skill as a unit increases."

Pat Milligan, senior in psychology and bass player for Copus, said he feels practice is important.

"Only two of us live in Manhattan, so we have to practice whenever we have a chance," Milligan said. "It's not as often as we'd like, so we have to make the most of it when we do."

Besides practicing the music, the visual part of the show must be worked on as well, Holz said. This helps to energize the crowd.

"When we practice we also work on stage presence as well," Holz said. "Nobody wants to go see a band that just stands there and plays. If the band doesn't look like it's having a good time, chances are the audience won't have a good time."

Edwards said without fan support, the desire to play would diminish.

"We (the bands) work hard to provide Manhattan with a good local music scene, but we need students and fans to come support us," he said.

Did you know? Things Genepool does to prepare for a show

- One to two months before the show begins, Genepool writes or calls several venues for a show.
- One month before the show they get confirmation.
- Practice set two to three times a week.
- Argue about the set, songs and visuals.

- Show up to the venue, about two to three hours before the show.
- Set up the stage.
- Check equipment: instruments, lighting, public address system, etc.
- Sound check.
- Rock on.
- Rock off about an hour later.
- After the show, tear down set, or unplug, pack up and leave.
- Party on with free beer tab.

Moore draws boos at Republican convention

Already a box office sensation, filmmaker Michael Moore got another loud reception Monday at the Republican National Convention.

This time it was boos.

When Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., told the delegates about "a disingenuous filmmaker who would have us believe that Saddam's Iraq was an oasis of peace," they knew he was referring to the maker of "Fahrenheit 9/11." The film, which savages Bush's Iraq policy, has set a box office record for documentaries, grossing $115 million so far.

McCain's comments prompted prolonged booing and chants of "Four more years."

Many of the delegates faced Moore, who was seated in the press seats at Madison Square Garden, because he is writing a column this week for USA Today.

Moore seemed to relish the attention, thrusting his arms over his head, laughing and saying, "Two more months."

Asked about McCain's remarks, Moore said, "I can't believe they're dumb enough to bring up the film and help its box office."

Moore's other box office success, "Bowling for Columbine," was released in 2002. It dealt with the issue of gun control.

Actress Theron hurt on German film set

Oscar-winning actress Charlize Theron was injured while shooting her new Paramount film, "Aeon Flux," in Germany, but it wasn't immediately clear how badly she was hurt.

Monday's accident was apparently caused while Theron was doing her own stunts, Paramount Pictures spokeswoman Jasmine Madatou said Tuesday.

Filming in Berlin has been halted to allow her to recover. It wasn't known if the injury would require script changes or when the movie would resume production.

Theron's publicist said she had no information about the cause or severity of the accident, but said the 29-year-old actress wasn't hospitalized.

CDs' removal causes debate

ACLU accuses attorney general of censorship

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kansas Attorney General Phill Kline has been accused of censorship by the American Civil Liberties Union.

Regional ACLU Executive Director Dick Kurtenbach said the accusations are because of the action Kline took when distributing music CDs to public libraries in Kansas.

The CDs were part of a lawsuit settlement between the music industry and the State of Kansas after several states raised concerns about price fixing.

Kansas, along with other states, decided the CDs should be given to public libraries for citizens to use.

Whitney Watson, spokesman for Kline's office, said about 33 of the albums included in the settlement were too explicit to be given to libraries.

"We took out the albums that promoted drug abuse, violence against law enforcement and violence against women," Watson said.

Kurtenbach said what Kline did was censorship, and librarians should choose what goes in their collection.

"Librarians are professionals, they are trained in selecting materials for their collections," he said.

Watson said because the CDs are a gift to the libraries, what Kline did wasn't censorship.

"We never told the libraries they couldn't have certain CDs," he said. "We didn't go in and take them off the shelf."

Kurtenbach said it doesn't matter if the CDs are a gift.

"I'm not persuaded that that is any rationale for exercising the censorship involved in the case," he said. "If someone gave land to Kansas to set up a park, Phill Kline could set up that park and limit it to the majority of Kansans, whether that be people who are mostly white, black or whomever."

Kay Russell, assistant director of North Central Kansas Libraries System, said the CDs were first distributed to the regional library system before being sent to public libraries.

The CDs for libraries in the North Central region were sent to their headquarters located at the Manhattan Public Library.

Russell said they received about 3,000 CDs by genre.

"We had to take the CDs out of the box and divide them again to give the public libraries more variety," she said. "We didn't want one library to receive an entire box of classical CDs and nothing else."

About 49 libraries in the North Central region received the gift. Russell said libraries were free to dispose of the CDs if they did not want the entire box they received.

"We left it up to the libraries to see if they would fit into their CD collections," she said.

Marcy Allen, head of collection development at the Manhattan Public Library, assisted Russell in distributing the collections to the other libraries in the region.

"Nothing was left out because of content, but we did try to limit duplications of the same CD," she said. "We also tried to get a lot of CDs to some of the smaller libraries."

Allen said when she selects CDs for the library, she tries to select CDs representing different styles of music.

"We acquire materials that suit people's recreational, informational and educational needs," she said.

Allen said she selects items for her collection based on reviews offered by magazines and newspapers that "have proved to be good standing and honorable."

Although Hale Library did not receive any CDs because they are not considered a public library, Char Simser, assistant dean at Hale, said they do not judge their material based on the content.

"Our general philosophy is that if it is for education or research purposes, whether it is explicit or not, we will use it for our collection if it is requested by the departments on campus," she said.

Subway bombing kills at least 10

By Steve Gutterman
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MOSCOW — A woman strapped with explosives blew herself up Tuesday night outside a busy Moscow subway station, killing at least 10 people and wounding more than 50 in the second terrorist attack to hit Russia in a week.

Seven days earlier, almost to the hour, two Russian jetliners crashed within minutes of each other in what officials determined were terrorist bombings. All 90 people aboard were killed, and the investigation has focused on two Chechen women believed to have been passengers.

A militant Muslim Web site published a statement late Tuesday claiming responsibility for the subway bombing on behalf of the "Islambouli Brigades," a group that also claimed it caused the jetliner crashes with suicide teams in retribution for Russia's war with Islamic rebels in Chechnya. The veracity of neither claim could be confirmed.

The statement said Tuesday's bombing was a blow to Russian President Vladimir Putin, "who slaughtered Muslims time and again." Putin has firmly refused to negotiate with the rebels in predominantly Muslim Chechnya, saying they must be wiped out.

Several female suicide bombers allegedly connected with the rebels have caused carnage in Moscow and other Russian cities in a series of attacks in recent years.

Mayor Yuri Luzhkov told reporters near the Rizhskaya subway stop in northern Moscow that the bomber was walking toward the station shortly after 8 p.m. but turned around when she saw two police officers.

She "decided to destroy herself in a crowd of people" in a busy area between the subway station and a nearby department store-supermarket complex, Luzhkov said, adding that the bomb was packed with bolts and pieces of metal.

"There was a desire to cause maximum damage," he said.

A spokesman for the Federal Security Service, Sergei Ignatchenko, told NTV television that the casualty toll had risen to 10 dead and 51 wounded, of whom 49 were hospitalized. Many of the injured were believed to be seriously wounded, and the death toll was expected to rise. It was not immediately clear if the number of dead included the bomber.

A white car was set afire, and shattered windows and bloodied people lay on the asphalt in front of the subway station.

A woman, apparently distraught with panic, pushed away a man who repeatedly reached out to help her.

Study Abroad program offers unique academic opportunity

By Karthik Reddy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Study Abroad program is finding increasing favor among K-State students with the number of applicants rising each semester.

The program allows students, mostly undergraduates, to travel abroad to a country of their choice, except to those issued a State Department warning, and spend a period of time studying there.

Most participants truly eye-opening experience that helped them explore new cultures and customs.

"I learned so much from living with a family abroad" Abby McCollough, senior in mass communications, said. "There were a lot of K-state students that lived with families."

Students in the program are free to travel to countries all over the world, but Spain, Australia and the Czech Republic are the most popular destinations, Kelsey Holste, senior in agribusiness and peer group advisor, said.

Jenifer Chambers, program director, said students joining the program could also apply for a scholarship, which was awarded by a committee which reviewed various aspects of the student's merits and goals.

All students receiving a scholarship were required, upon return to K-State, to do a number of service hours proportional to the scholarship amount received, she said.

The hours varied between two and 10 hours and were something most students were quite happy serving, Chambers said.

The students said it mostly involved making presentations about their experiences abroad, assisting in the Study Abroad Fair and in some instances helping with the shuttle service to the airport.

Students who had been a part of the Study Abroad program said they were more than willing to complete the service hours and thought of them as being akin to community service.

Since last year, these service hours guaranteed wider outreach and generated enthusiasm for the study abroad program.

"It is one experience that is really difficult to quantify and helps the students grow more mature and focused," Chambers said.

ICAT | New incentives offered

Along with the opportunity to win tickets to next season's games, ICAT ticket-holders also have the chance to win free pizza.

At every home football, volleyball, basketball and baseball game, 10 students will be chosen by the ICAT board to be seated in the Purple Pride Row — the front row at the event. Along with better seats, the students receive free pizza.

Students wearing the most purple or who are painted up the most determine who gets chosen, Stein said.

Veteran ICAT ticket holder Dustin Duntz, junior in math education, said he is excited about the changes.

"It's a neat idea to help get people to go to other sports. It will increase the fun and team spirit," he said. "The student section is the most exciting place to watch K-State athletics."

Carolyn Denney, senior in family studies and human services, watched K-State athletics from the ICAT section for four years and enjoyed her experiences.

The seats offer a better view and are closer to the band, Denney said.

She agreed the new incentives will benefit K-State athletics.

"It will help to get more involvement to all sporting events instead of just the more popular sports like volleyball and football," Denney said.

Stein said the changes are a way to recognize and thank the ICAT group for all of their participation in a fun way. She said she also hopes to create a more exciting athletic experience.

"We want to take the atmosphere up a notch," Denney said.

"Our concentration and our focus right now is more on the other side of the ball and our ability to receive serves, our setters ability to locate consistently, and our hitters ability to get in a good rhythm and hit with range on the same shot over and over," she said.

For Fritz, the match is an opportunity to win her first season opener as Wildcat coach. K-State is 20-11 all-time in their first games, but 0-3 under Fritz.

Senior hitter Michaela Franklin said the Wildcats need to continue developing team chemistry.

"I think right now the big key for us, after losing so many people and having so many new faces on the court, is communication," she said.

CAL-C | Marketers for calcium beverage target women, children it. We don't have a lot of sales data that says this has been on the market for 10 years. We are two years old."

Instead, Libel said NutriJoy has found a niche in the market to fill.

"I think I have seen where it says calcium is the number one sought after vitamin or mineral," he said. "Consumers understand their body needs calcium. That's where Cal-C comes along. The niche is the calcium phenomenon that people's milk consumption has gone down and with that on the decline, there is a real concern that people aren't getting enough calcium."

Because of the calcium factor, the drink will continue to be targeted to women, who are at a high risk for developing osteoporosis. Children also need the calcium to develop their bones and prevent fractures, Libel said.

But all that nutrition doesn't have to come without enjoyment, he said.

"Our goal is to put out products that are nutritious yet are primarily consumed for enjoyment," Libel said. "They taste great but they are good for you."

In the future, NutriJoy will test the market with Good Bites, a healthy snack cracker.

anybody getting the vaccine," Reppert said. "The risk is assessed with community living. There are no statistics for fraternities or sororities, but they may have a higher risk."

The vaccine is only 70 percent effective in preventing the disease, which is low compared to routine vaccines that are more than 90 percent effective, Kennedy said.

"There are five main strains, and they've been able to make effective vaccines for four of the strains but not the fifth, which causes 30 percent of the cases," Reppert said.

Because the meningitis risk is still there, students need to watch out for each other, Reppert said.

Common symptoms include headache, stiff neck, fever, nausea and vomiting, lethargy and rash.

The Riley County-Manhattan Health Department also has seen a rise in vaccinations, which cost $73 and are given by appointment.

"We've given a lot this fall with kids going to college," Kathy Dickey-Wilson, clinic supervisor, said.

She said the rise in vaccine requests can be attributed to increased awareness by the news media and college health officials.

A new vaccine is expected to be released in January, which lasts 20 years compared to the current vaccine's duration of three to 10 years. The new shot will cost $80.

Although Lafene is busy, students with health concerns shouldn't assume they can't get an appointment, Kennedy said.

"If students have an illness or injury," she said, "we have a triage, so they can be seen in the same day."

RAPE | RCPD narrows list of suspects in assault case

Grubbs said while there has been no arrest, there are several suspects.

"The police department has been narrowing down the suspects," Grubbs said. "We hope to convict the guilty person and prevent these crimes from happening."

"I have been working in the investigation division for over 20 years. It is a shame to see people, in particular young women, suffer from these crimes."

If raped, victims should call 911 immediately, and the police will assist, Grubbs said.

"Leave your clothing on, and do not clean up - for even a small portion of DNA evidence will lead us to a closer step of solving the case."

Grubbs said he encourages anyone who has been raped or who knows information about a rape to file a report right away, because that rape report could prevent other women from suffering from the same crime.

Protesters could affect political climate

By Joanna Rubick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Hundreds of thousands of demonstrators bombarded the Republican National Convention in New York City this week protesting many issues, including the war in Iraq.

Beginning Sunday, protesters gathered outside Madison Square Garden, where the convention is being held, carrying signs and chanting, according to the Associated Press.

Much of the protesting has been focused on anti-war messages, although not all.

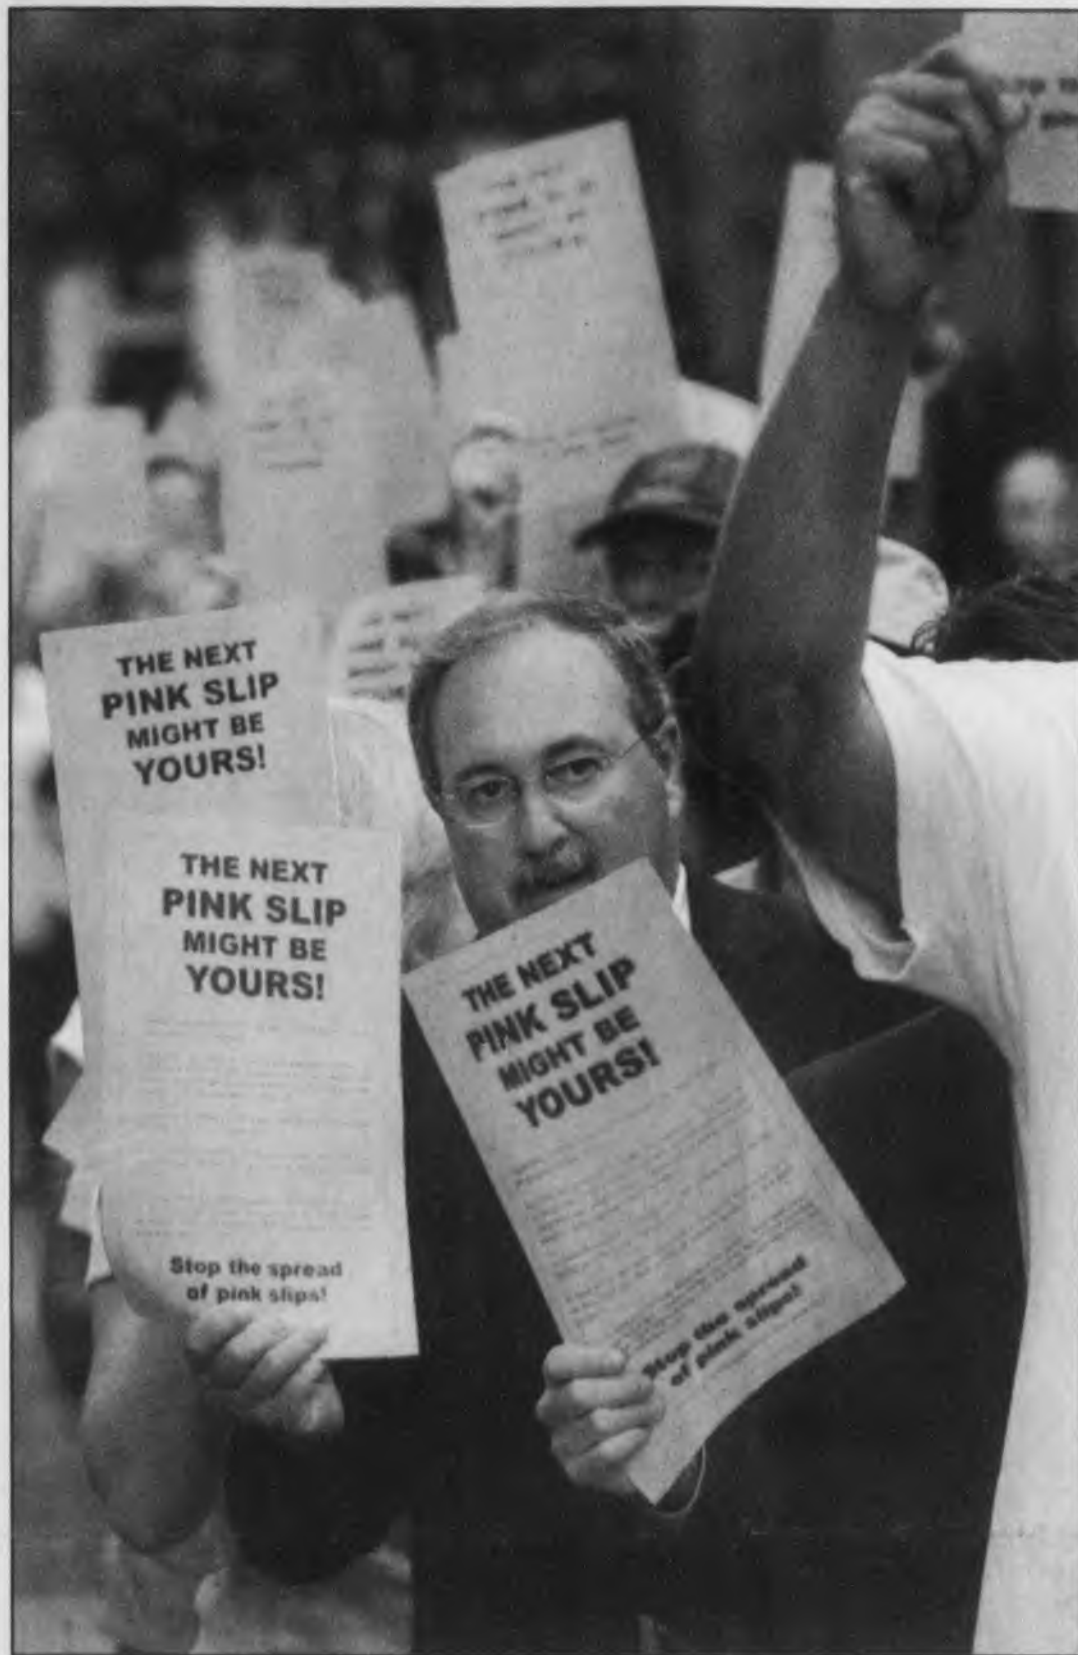

According to the Associated Press, thousands of protesters formed a three-mile long line waving pink fliers that said, "The Next Pink Slip Might Be Yours!" on Wednesday.

Joe Aistrup, associate professor of political science, said the protesting could produce mixed results.

"Sometimes protests have an opposite reaction than protesters want. Sometimes protesters are viewed as the extreme," Aistrup said.

"I don't know if it will happen here, but it may be the case that more people will support Bush."

Tom Grimes, Ross Beach Chair at the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications, said the way protesters conduct themselves can have an effect on the way people view the Manager seeks new employees

El Cazador will reopen its doors later this month, after illegal immigrant employees were deported.

Sammy Samarra, executive vice president with S and S Development Company, Inc., said the business will open as soon as possible.

The manager, Santiago Palomino, rents El Cazador from S and S, and has been looking for employees for the Manhattan location, Samarra said.

"They've found two cooks, and they are looking for two more," he said. "They are also looking for waiters."

Samarra said Santiago wants to make sure all his employees are in the country legally.

"He's called more than 300 people, and said he doesn't want to mess around," Samarra said. "He's been contacting people all over the U.S."

Previously, the problem was employees of El Cazador had fake green cards, and Santiago did not know they were fake, Samarra said.

"They all had it, and it looks like some of them were fake," he said. "His English is not the best, so he had to rely on the green cards."

The Manhattan and Junction City locations are expected to open first followed by the Topeka location, he said.

Russian militants take hostages in school

By Musa Sadulayev
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BESLAN, Russia — Militants wearing suicide-bomb belts on Wednesday seized a southern Russian school in a region bordering Chechnya, taking hundreds of hostages — many of them children — and threatening to blow up the building if police storm it. At least two people have been reported killed, including a school parent.

Hours into the desperate standoff, security officials said they made brief contact with the hostage-takers. Russian special forces wearing camouflage and carrying heavy-caliber machine guns surrounded Middle School No. 1. About 1,000 people, mostly parents, were massed near the three-story building in the town of Beslan, demanding information and accusing the government of failing to protect their children.

Kazbek Dzantiyev, head of the North Ossetia region's Interior Ministry, said the hostages have threatened "for every destroyed fighter, they will kill 50 children and for every injured fighter — 20 (children)," the ITAR-Tass news

Antihistamines help ease discomfort of allergy season as pollen counts soar

By Sarah Rice

With allergy season in full swing, medication is about all that can help.

"It's just that it's pollination season," said Dr. Roxana Voica, allergy specialist at the Topeka Allergy and Asthma Clinic. "It starts the 15th of August and goes through the months of September and October. People who have an allergy to ragweed can have itchy watery eyes, uncontrollable sneezing, sometimes wheezing, chest congestion and coughing spells."

Pollen counts are high for the Midwest region. According to www.pollen.com, Wednesday's pollen count was 10.5 on a 12.0 scale. Friday is forecasted to reach 11.5.

"Next week we are going to see even higher amounts of ragweed in the area," Voica said. "It's not only that ragweed is in the air, there is just a lot there, too. People who are sensitive will respond to this high amount. For the last two days, we have seen a definite increase in the number of ragweed pollen in the air."

Those who are suffering from allergic reactions can find refuge in medications, but that's about it, said Jay Reppert, Lafene Health Center medical director.

"Most of the over-the-counter antihistamines may cause drowsiness," he said. "Claritin and the generic forms don't cause drowsiness. There are some prescription nasal spray are very effective but not available without a prescription."

Voica said people who know they are allergic to ragweed should begin medicating immediately even if they don't feel the symptoms.

"If they need medication and they know they have trouble this time of the year, it's better to self-medicate right away as soon as ragweed starts pollinating," she said.

SGA compensation rates considered

By Scott Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student leaders with control of Student Governing Association's purse strings and policies may be in line for personal income increases.

This semester, members of the Joint Committee on Officers' Compensation will consider changes regarding how much and in what form Student Governing Association officers are compensated.

Bill Muir, non-voting statutory chair of the committee and assistant vice president of institutional advancement, said the committee will consider those issues, as well as who gets the compensation.

Currently, the student body president, vice president, attorney general, senate chair, vice chair and heads of the allocations and privilege fee committees receive financial compensation for their duties, Muir said.

"The committee could look at the list and expand it or decrease it," he said. "Once that is decided, we'll see what kind of things can be looked at as far as total overall dollar amounts."

Although other possibilities exist, Muir said he didn't think new perks would be added soon.

"At some campuses, like Texas A&M, they get free football tickets," he said. "I believe at Missouri, they get their own parking stall, so there are numerous different things we could consider."

Ultimately, the decisions are up to the committee, he said.

Muir said the committee is composed of five voting members. The president, senate chair and attorney general, appoint one each, two student senators, who are voted in by the students, choose one and, lastly, one is chosen by two non-voting members himself and Gayle Spencer, adviser for the Office of Student Activities and Services.

"Right now, we're compiling information from all Big 12 institutions as to what they're providing their student leaders, and then we'll look at it in relation to what we're doing as we did three years ago and see what adjustments can be made, or should be made, or what we can afford."

The committee must present its report and recommendation to the Senate by Oct. 15, he said.

"If Student Senate does not, by Nov. 15 by a majority vote, pass a bill disapproving it, then it becomes law," Muir said.

He said if Senate does pass such a bill, it will be sent back to committee to be revised, amended and resubmitted by Dec. 1.

Following that, if Student Senate fails to pass a bill of disapproval by Dec. 1, the proposal would become law.

Muir noted any bill of disapproval could be vetoed by the student body president.

"I think this is the one fair way to determine what compensation and scholarship should be; it's worked real well," he said.

Student Body President Hayley Urkevich said that while the compensation could benefit from reconsideration, she doesn't believe many people in SGA become active for the money.

"I guess, for me, the pay has nothing to do with the decision to run," Urkevich said. "It's a nice benefit for something I would be doing anyway."

She said the compensation was helpful, because with the time requirements of her position, she does not have enough time to hold down an additional job.

"It allows me to have some kind of income coming in," she said.

Urkevich said K-State's compensation package was limited compared to similar universities' packages.

"Compared to our peer institutions, we are compensated significantly less," she said. "It would make sense to reexamine it to keep it kind of in line with the tuition increase."

Senator David McCandless, senior in political science and committee member, said the committee was going to look at whatever precedent is available from K-State and other institutions.

"I wouldn't anticipate any drastic changes," McCandless said. "I would like to look at the committee chairs and see how much work they do."

He said if there are committee chairs who are doing equivalent amounts of work, they, too, should be compensated.

Muir said he can't speak for the committee, but he believes positions such as Senate vice chair are not adequately compensated. He also said the 4-percent annual increase agreed on three years ago wasn't nearly sufficient to cover rising tuition costs.

"As a percentage of the total tuition, scholarships have gone down significantly," he said.

The compensation proposals are prepared every three years in line with the renewal of the OSAS budget, Muir said.

Professors drop 100 students due to policy

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This fall, professors dropped more than 100 students from classes, because the students didn't show up on the first day of class.

This is part of the current drop policy that took effect April 13. The policy permits teachers to drop students who do not attend class on the first day.

Jackie Spears, president of Faculty Senate, said the policy was intended to help out with closed courses.

"Some of the professors want to let students who are on the wait list into the course, so they drop the students who don't show up the first day," she said. "I was a little surprised at the number of faculty that took advantage of it, and I was equally surprised that only about 100 students were affected."

Spears said she tracked the use of the policy by asking Enrollment Services for a list of instructor-initiated drops that were made during the first three days of class.

Students dropped on the first day could contest it, Spears said, but it would be the faculty member's decision to let them back in or not.

"I would guess if a faculty member felt he or she had the space and could accommodate the students, they would do so, but if they can't they have the right to say no and leave those spaces for students who are there and ready to go," she said.

Tom Grimes, associate professor of journalism and mass communications, said he did not enforce the drop policy.

"I think it's an unfair policy to students," he said. "There are all sorts of very good reasons that a student might not be able to show up to class on the first day. Things can be very confusing, and many of them are trying to get their life sorted out."

Numbers of Students Dropped

- Aug. 18: 19
- Aug. 19: 16
- Aug. 20: 74
- Total: 109
- 84 students were dropped from classes that were closed and 25 were dropped from classes that are still open.

Blair Reynolds, Student Senate representative for Faculty Senate, said he thinks it is too soon to see the effects.

"I would say that Faculty Senate intentions with the change in the policy are positive, but whether or not it will actually be more beneficial than destructive remains to be seen," he said.

Spears said the Student Governing Association discussed the possibility of reconsidering the policy last spring, with the goal of making student expectations clearer.

"At that point it was really late in the year, and there was no way to put that on the faculty senate agenda," she said.

Erik Ankrom, student body vice president, said some students had problems contacting their instructors to inform them they would be absent on the first day.

"Some of the instructors aren't listed for the course, it is just listed as staff, so one of the changes we would like to make is that every instructor is known by the first day of class," he said. "If that's not possible, we would like to move the policy from the first day to the second day."

Ankrom said labs may be treated differently because of their scheduling, so they may make an exception for them.

SGA will discuss their concerns with the Academic Affairs Committee later this month.

TO THE POINT Choose healthy alternatives over dieting fads

Every year, without fail, a new "world's greatest diet" emerges. While one's health is not something to be taken for granted, obsession over fad diets can be harmful.

At K-State, students are fortunate enough to have numerous facilities at their disposal, facilities that can help them properly manage their physique. Employees at the Wellness Center at Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, as well as nutrition counselors at Lafene Student Health Center, are available for students to receive one-on-one coaching when it comes to developing personal health programs.

It makes sense that students would take advantage of these services. They are, after all, already included as part of students' privilege fees.

Such opportunities can be both effective and healthy alternatives to fad diets, which are questionably effective and can cause significant health problems.

So, before you go off and eat another grapefruit or count another carbohydrate, consider that a more effective approach may include sensible eating and sufficient exercise.

And make use of the wonderful things your student privilege fees already provide.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Who's the man?

Unconventional antics hold sway over GOP success

The thought still haunts me. Thanks to the Bush twins, Jenna and Barbara, I have an image etched in my skull of George and Laura Bush "shak(ing) it like a Polaroid picture."

Such is the joy of political conventions. The daughters of the most powerful man in the free world spouted off several minutes of lame one-liners before introducing their father.

In July, Democrats shocked the nation by choosing John "Heinz" Kerry as their presidential nominee, and the nation is waiting with bated breath to see who the Republicans will choose tonight.

I'm expecting a surprise candidate from the Republicans, because it would be silly for the fiscal conservatives to spend millions of dollars to announce an obvious choice.

Political pundits are predicting George W. Bush will be nominated for a second term, but I'm crossing my fingers for John McCain.

McCain, a senator from Arizona, spoke at the convention Monday, calling Michael Moore a "disingenuous filmmaker."

I'd have called Moore a tubby pile of penguin excretion, but I'm not as politically savvy as McCain.

In response to McCain's comment, the ever-polite Moore raised his thumb and forefinger to show McCain the "loser" sign.

Across the nation, there was an audible chorus of seventh-graders yelling, "Oh, snap!"

Moore has had an inordinate amount of weight (pun intended) over the agendas of both parties, but with Moore tucked neatly away in the press corps, the Republicans should be able to one-up the Democrats' convention.

The Democrats' quarter-million dollar balloon drop went sour with many left in the rafters. Delegates were left without anything to inhale or bat around the crowd, so they settled for crowd-surfing Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Despite those minor setbacks, Kerry has been riding high on his post-convention influx of support that typically follows a convention. The bounce, comprised entirely of a Milwaukee bartender named Carl, has since shifted back to "undecided."

But now it's the GOP's (Grumpy Old People)'s time to shine.

A cadre of top politicians and body-builders already had their time in the spotlight. On Tuesday, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger headlined with First Lady Laura Bush to discuss the president's strengths.

One CNN correspondent referred to the lineup as "Conan and the librarian." He then was beaten mercilessly by his colleagues, because that's a lame comment even for television news.

In another, unrelated, more-embarrassing pummeling, President Bush will speak tonight.

Because all the smarter, more likable Republicans already had their turns to speak, Bush takes the stage tonight to outline his strategy for the upcoming election.

His primary goal for his second term will be to not let Cheney have any more heart attacks.

The delegates who have gathered in New York this week will no doubt be mesmerized, knowing the fate of the election could ride on tonight's success.

All eyes in Madison Square Garden will be fixed on the make-or-break aspect of Bush's presidency – the success of the balloon-drop.

The Republicans should be sure to win that contest, unless Moore eats all the confetti.

SWM visits dating sites in desperation

Dating is tough for me. Sure, I can attract any number of women who have chemical imbalances. There's no problem there. I've cornered that market.

CHANCE YORK

But so far I haven't been able to find that special, normal someone. You know, a girl I don't have to worry about suffocating me at night with a pillow.

Though I still cling to the fact that I have yet to stoop to the lowest level of the dating food chain, the last act of desperation, the final pathetic attempt at companionship – the online personal ad.

Until now. According to a CNN article from 2000, "the United States has 50 million single people between 20 to 55, and 61 percent of them will use an online dating service this year."

And now it is time that I, too, resort to a much cheaper method of dating. I was surprised by the huge advancements we've made from the creepy personal ad.

For instance, in addition to reading about an individual, now you get the opportunity to see a hideous photo of them as well.

Have you seen some of these quality personal ad photos? They're grainy. They're washed out. A lot of them are so blurry you can barely tell it's a human being. Something else I noticed is that the most common phrase used throughout online personals is, "I'm a fun and outgoing person," which makes sense because most sociable, fun-loving thrill seekers tend to spend lots of time in a dark room, hunched over a computer, trying to find a date. The biggest thing I'm concerned about is the format of online personals. When signing up for an ad, both Yahoo and MSN require you to enter a specific list of qualities that you desire in your potential date – things like body type, ethnicity, height, age, eyes and hair. Yahoo even has an input field for astrology, which is a helpful opener for that first awkward conversation, "Hi, I'm a Libra, and I'm currently incarcerated."

If you've already been reduced to posting an advertisement of yourself on the Internet, how picky can you possibly be? At this point the only specifics should be – I'll take anything that moves.

Finally, I'd like to mention while that posting an online personal ad is free at Yahoo and www.msn.com, responding to one is not.

That's right. In order for you to contact your future cuddle bunny you must first provide your credit card information and pay a small fee, which is perhaps the classiest aspect of the entire process. But, alas, classy is one thing I am not.

I have decided to take the online dating plunge, along with countless other hopeless, desperate, pathetic people out there, to show the world that we nerds, jerks, perverts, and general losers, can potentially be devoted, loving partners if given the opportunity.

There's even a link to my online personal at www.kstatecollegian.com, so everyone can treasure this historic, yet wretched event.

TO THE EDITOR

Peace begins with Iraqi citizenry

Editor,

This response is to the column written by Altaf Karim.

I have been regularly reading Karim's columns in Collegian and truly understand his position on the Iraq war and the anti-American sentiment. But when he supports the violence perpetrated by certain Iraqi people and deems it a freedom struggle, it troubles me.

I agree that this Iraq war was unnecessary, that America was acting as a superpower and attacked Iraq, and it is on most occasions selfish and manipulative. But if the United States had calmly left Iraq after removing the Saddam regime, there would certainly have been a civil war. The civil war would have been much worse than the situation on ground today. It would have given an opportunity to other Saddams and the like to fight for power struggle.

If Al-Sadr and the like truly want freedom for their motherland why could they not have demanded a say in the interim government by peaceful means? Is the armed struggle getting them anywhere nearer to their goal than what any peaceful means could? The arms struggle in my opinion is aiding the United States in remaining in the region for longer than needed.

U.S. foreign policy has tried (many times successfully) to oppress nations which pose a threat to their military, economic and political superiority. No region, religion or racial background has been an exception.

There is more than one way to fight this oppression and certainly violent struggle cannot be extolled as one. It pains me to see that a religion like Islam, founded to prevent violence among ancient tribes, today being portrayed as evil because of the acts of a few fanatics. The whole Muslim community has to suffer because of this. Their so-called "Jihad" is not liberating them but is demeaning the Muslims and the religion of Islam.

What we need today in the West, Middle East and the East are people who understand that no religion, race or nationality is superior. We need people who are moderate, educated and considerate of other ideas, opinions and ways of lives.

I do not know if a semblance of peace around the world is possible, I do not know if democracy is necessary in the Middle East for stability and peace, if there will be peace in Iraq in the near future or if the United States will pull out of Iraq in the next two to five years.

What I know is that if the present thoughts and actions of politicians in power in the U.S. (and other militarily strong nations) and the "freedom fighters" in Iraq (and other countries) continue, there will be more dead bodies arriving in home coffins. Is this a cause for celebration or even salutation for anybody or any religion?

Students should take opportunity to vote

OKLAHOMA DAILY (UNIVERSITY OF OKLAHOMA)

NORMAN, Okla. — Students who are not registered to vote need to do so now.

People on both sides of the political spectrum agree that the presidential election this November is one of the most important elections the United States has ever had.

Many important issues are at

The election this November could have a lasting impact on all of these issues.

Very few students at OU are walking on the fence about any of these issues.

For any students at OU who are not registered to vote, the time to register is now.

Volleyball victory

Team wins season opener

By Kent Hildebrand
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After a sluggish start, the women's volleyball team bounced back for a season-opening win over Oral Roberts Wednesday at Ahearn Field House.

The Wildcats swept the match in three games, 30-28, 30-23 and 30-21.

In the first game, the Golden Eagles took advantage of a slow K-State start to go on a 10-0 run midway through the game, before the Wildcats battled back with a 14-5 run of their own to capture the win.

K-State won the next two games without much difficulty, despite being plagued with missed serves, kills and poor passing throughout the night.

Coach Suzie Fritz said she wasn't happy with the team's overall performance, especially that of some of the veteran players.

"We played like a young team tonight; I'm not going to make excuses for anything," she said. "I think it's a natural thing that young players go through. But as I said before, the disappointing thing to me is that it wasn't the young players that were going through it; it was some of our veteran players that have been in those situations a thousand times before, and I was disappointed that they didn't step up."

NBA | Prosecutors drop charges against Bryant

The criminal case against Kobe Bryant collapsed Wednesday as prosecutors dropped the sexual assault charge against him, saying they had no choice because the NBA star's accuser no longer wanted to participate.

Bryant, whose trial had been days from opening arguments, responded with an apology to the woman who had accused him and whose civil suit for damages is still pending.

"Although I truly believe this encounter between us was consensual, I recognize now that she did not and does not view this incident the same way I did," Bryant said. "I now understand how she feels that she did not consent to this encounter."

The woman's attorney, John Clune, said she has been through an extremely difficult time since she alleged she was raped, and that she was disturbed by a series of courthouse mistakes that included release of her name and medical history. She has been the subject of death threats and relentless media coverage in the high-profile case.

The dismissal marks a dramatic but not entirely unexpected turn in the high-profile case against one of the NBA's brightest young stars. For months, prosecutors had insisted they had a strong enough case to win a conviction beyond a reasonable doubt, but legal experts said their case was greatly weakened when Bryant's attorneys convinced the judge to allow some evidence about his accuser's sexual history.

Outside the courthouse, District Attorney Mark Hurlbert said the decision to drop the case "is not based upon a lack of belief in the victim—she is an extremely credible and an extremely brave young woman."

CFB | University of Colorado Regent hires lawyer

University of Colorado Regent Jim Martin said Tuesday he has hired a lawyer amid reports a grand jury has concluded the regents are "unqualified" to supervise the embattled football program.

Martin, who did not seek reelection this year, said he consulted with Attorney General Ken Salazar's office and decided to hire his own counsel. He would not elaborate.

The comments came as six regents met privately for four hours to discuss the report with CU President Elizabeth Hoffman, CU-Boulder Chancellor Richard Byyny and chief legal counsel Charles Sweet. A university spokeswoman said officials had no comment.

The grand jury began investigating in May whether Colorado's football program used sex and alcohol to lure recruits.

The panel, which finished meeting Aug. 19, handed up an indictment accusing former football recruiting aide Nathan Maxcey of soliciting for a prostitute for himself.

NBA | Mourning wants to comeback with Nets

Seven-time All-Star Alonzo Mourning will attempt a comeback with the New Jersey Nets this season, less than a year after a kidney transplant.

The center, who had signed with the Nets before last season, played only 12 games before retiring Nov. 24 because of complications from a kidney disease, focal segmental glomerulosclerosis. He was diagnosed before the 2000-01 season, when he was with the Miami Heat.

Focal segmental glomerulosclerosis, or FSGS, affects the kidney filters that remove toxins from the blood. In the weeks before Mourning's retirement, tests showed that his kidney function had deteriorated and that the chemical imbalances in his blood made it dangerous for him to play.

Freshman libero showcases talent at game

By Josh Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Angie Lastra didn't deny it — she was nervous.

But for a team stocked with four talented seniors, it was the freshman libero who was at times the women's volleyball team's most consistent player in Wednesday night's 3-0 win over Oral Roberts at Ahearn Field House.

In her first match as a Wildcat, Lastra led K-State in digs and service aces with 11 and five, respectively.

Sophomore outside hitter Sandy Werner said she was impressed with Lastra's play.

"I thought Angie did very well for her first time out," Werner said. "I think she'll be a good asset to this team."

On a night where the 2003 Big 12 Championship banner was unveiled in the rafters and more than 1,200 fans packed the sweltering Ahearn, some would think the pressure might get to a 5-foot-6 freshman.

Lastra kept her cool, though, saying she tried to feed off her more-experienced teammates.

"They give me a lot of confidence having them near me," said Lastra of seniors starters Michaela Franklin, Lisa Martin, Gabby Guerre and Vali Hejjas. "I have a lot to learn from them."

Perhaps Lastra's biggest contribution to the team was her play behind the service line.

While the Wildcats combined for 14 service errors, Lastra had just one.

Franklin said the Puerto Rico native did a good job starting rallies for the Wildcats.

"She's a great player; she's very quick," Franklin said. "And she had a great serve and ran off some points for us."

That's what the coaching staff expects, Coach Suzie Fritz said.

"She came in and put a couple of strings of points together, which is what we ask her to do," Fritz said. "Go back and stay there more than once."

Yet Lastra's play was not flawless.

Though Fritz complemented Lastra, she said the freshman needs to become more assertive.

"She's a little more timid than we would like to see," Fritz said. "We have huge expectations for her, and we have put her in a very difficult role being a libero as a freshman."

As the Wildcats prepare for this weekend's Houston Tournament and the season progresses, Fritz said she expects Lastra to grow with each game.

Drew Rose | COLLEGIAN

"She's doing a terrific job, but we need her to be a little more vocal, and we need her to go and take some balls away from people," Fritz said. "I think as she becomes more comfortable and confident, she'll do that."

Coming out of retirement: Welcome back, 'Prime Time'

Michael Jordan did it. Roger Clemens did it. George Foreman did it. And now Deion "Prime Time" Sanders has done it, joining a group of professional athletes who were not content with retirement.

On Wednesday, the future hall of famer and greatest cornerback to play in the National Football League signed a $1.5 million, one-year contract with the Baltimore Ravens, and I am loving it.

Don't get me wrong—Jordan, Clemens and Foreman are all great athletes, but I really didn't give a crap about any of them coming out of retirement. Prime Time, on the other hand, is the most exciting player I have ever seen. He was the whole reason I got interested in football, and now he is back after a three-year hiatus.

I have followed his career from the start, when he played at Florida State, all the way to his last year in the NFL with the Washington Redskins (but even Deion couldn't help that franchise).

Call him greedy, cocky, and any four-letter names you like, but when Deion steps on the field, he always will give you something to remember and tell your grandkids about.

Without Prime Time, where would Terrell Owens, Chad Johnson and all the other flashy players have gotten their creativity for celebrations?

After three years away from football, he is still the best cover corner in the league when he suits up for the Ravens this season and he instantly makes them even more of a Super Bowl contender.

The man ran under 4.4 seconds in the 40. Another way Deion turns the Ravens defense into even more of a threat is his experience. With 12 years of NFL knowledge, younger players will look up to him and be able to learn from him, making the younger players better.

Sanders may be used sparingly at first in the Ravens defense as a nickelback, but he won't be there long. There is no way a coach can have that talent only in one play per series, and Deion knows that.

What I like most about Deion is he is a walking quote machine. Take his first press conference as a Raven for example.

When asked if he no longer intends to be Prime Time by the Associated Press, Deion said:

"When did I stop being Prime Time? I didn't get that memo."

Now, you can't tell me a few Deion one-liners are not good for the newspapers and television reporters.

Prime Time, go get you another ring. I'll be watching and waiting for you to high-step all the way to another trophy.

Tofu recipes pave way to better eating

WILL KLUSENER

Last week, I provided you with some common sense safety tips that will aid you in your cooking escapades. There are more coming in the near future, and I hope you use them wisely.

However, now that you have a few basic rules under your belt, I'm going to give you some information and recipes that allow you to put those cooking rules to the test and possibly impress some of your friends. Oh yeah, you might even become healthier.

As you know, the diet of most college students is horrendous, and whether we like it or not, most of us are McKids. Don't get me wrong, hanging with the Ham-burglar and Fry Guy can be fun, but though they tempt you with meaty goodness and special sauce, it's all a grand façade.

All the while their friend cholesterol is sneaking its way through your veins toward your heart, and you've given it the key! And since you probably drove to eat instead of riding your bike, their by-products are lodging in and around your waistline and the underside of your arms in the form of the most feared and hated substance known to women—fat!

They're like that person you met at the party who seemed totally cool at first, but who now won't leave you the hell alone. For those of you who want to kick that leech to the curb for good, I've got something for you—Tofu.

Now before you swear to never again read another column by ol' Will, hear me out. Tofu is like nature's candy. Well, no it's not, but it is very versatile. I'll give you a brief run-down of what it is and how it's made (taken from www.tofu.com, very creative, no?) followed by a couple of quick and easy recipes you can actually make for yourself.

Tofu is essentially bean curd (much like cheese curd) from the soybean. The beans are soaked overnight and then drained. As they are pulverized, a small amount of water is poured over them, and a mashed potato-like mush is created.

The mash is then ladled into

Fad diets could prove detrimental to one's health, nutrition officials say

By Alison Filla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Eighties music, trucker hats and stone-washed jeans are fads—your diet shouldn't be.

Wanting to lose a few pounds is normal for some students, but there are healthy ways to do it.

Tiffany Gehlen, senior in nutrition and exercise, said there is a wide range of people who come to the Wellness Center at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex for anything from nutritional counseling to blood-pressure checks.

"They aren't focused on their eating," said Gehlen, fitness consultant at the Rec Complex. "They want to get on a healthier diet."

Gehlen said she sees people on a wide variety of diets, some harmful. She said people tend to over eat or exclude certain foods.

"The whole nation is obsessed with low-carb diets," Gehlen said. "We see people on Atkins and the South Beach diet. South Beach is probably the biggest diet."

She said they have a standard formula for recommending foods to students.

"Eat a lot of fruits and vegetables, drink lots of water, eat foods with a lot of fiber, protein and healthy fat," Gehlen said.

Dianna Schalles, registered dietitian and health educator for Lafene Health Center, said fad diets and trendy ideas about weight loss are not a good thing.

"They're not a long-term thing in the person's eyes," Schalles said. "They're not realistic. Usually people can't stick to them and then gain the weight back and then some."

Schalles said fad diets are short term, and rapid low-carb diets aren't the safest. She said she recommends exercise and a balanced diet.

"Make sure your physical activity hasn't declined since high school," Schalles said. "Eat a variety of foods—fruits, vegetables, whole grains."

"The bottom line is cutting calories. When you limit one food group, it can become boring and lead to bingeing. Don't spend a lot of money on expensive low-carb foods. Just eat a balanced diet."

She said some diets can become dangerous and can lead to eating disorders, which is a big concern. She recommends not losing more than two pounds a week on any rapid weight loss programs.

"College years are a high risk time for people who are vulnerable to eating disorders," Schalles said. "A lot of students are at a vulnerable time when it comes to the pressure of looking good."

Barbara Pearson, psychologist for University Counseling Services, said counseling can help with eating disorders. She said they don't have any groups to deal with eating disorders, but there are people to help.

"If four or more students want to start a group about eating disorders, we will start one," Pearson said. "We have a women's group. We're going to be talking about women's issues, including body image."

She said people do come in for help.

"It's part of the therapeutic process for students to recognize there's a problem that's interfering in their lives," Pearson said. "People use food for comfort and for gaining control in their lives. Freshman do have a high risk for developing eating problems, but eating problems can affect all ages."

Jenny Hardy, freshman in speech and language pathology, said she is worried about gaining the "freshman 15." She said she lives in Ford Hall, but she doesn't eat at the Derby Dining Center very often.

"I can't eat until three in the afternoon anyway," Hardy said. "I've eaten a few meals there, and maybe I picked the wrong lines, but I didn't like the food."

Hardy said she hasn't gone to the Rec Complex yet, and she's been eating a lot of junk food.

"That's how you gain the freshman 15," Hardy said. "At least that's what I've heard."

New York native and independent recording artist Bari Koral will bring creatively pop-infused songwriting tonight to the K-State Student Union.

Koral, who has been touring on and off for the past three and a half years, is enthusiastic about returning to perform in Manhattan.

"I totally dig Manhattan," Koral said. "I thought it was beautiful—the Flint Hills, Aggieville and the Konza Prairie. It was in Manhattan where I met a real cowboy! You don't see those too often in New York."

Tonight's show is presented by the Union Program Council and marks the first of this semester's Thursday Night Buzz performance series, said Ben Hopper, program advisor for UPC. He said he is anticipating the event.

"Bari performed three or four years ago," Hopper said. "She was very well received, so we thought it would be great for her to kick-off our Thursday Night Buzz series."

Her up-beat personality, both evident on-stage and in her lyrics, has brought Koral much recent acclaim. Performing along with artists such as Norah Jones, Lisa Loeb and Joan Osborne, Koral said she views her recent success with humility.

"It's a big pat on the back. I've been working a long time for this," she said. "Not everyone starts out playing for 10,000 people a night."

Lately, Koral said she has concentrated on playing venues at universities and colleges nationwide. Her stop at K-State is one of three performances in Kansas.

"I like these venues. I think I have a good fit with the college scene," Koral said.

Melanie Wages, Koral's publicist, said Koral has had great feedback across the country.

"People call us year after year wanting her to come back," Wages said. "She tours extensively from California, all the way out east, coast to coast," Wages said.

Koral said the new tour, which begins with tonight's show will include selections from Koral's two independent albums; her 1999 release "Joy" and her 2002 release "Cloudwalking." She said she also will feature new songs from her newest untitled release, due out in October.

"I have so many new songs. It's by far the best thing I've ever done. I'll also be doing some covers at the shows," Koral said.

"It's an amazing journey. It keeps getting weirder and crazier, but it feels good. I know how blessed I am."

CELEB NEWS

Bobby Knight readies for sitcom treatment

The life and times of Bobby Knight could soon be inside America's living rooms.

The fiery Texas Tech coach met with television officials last month in Los Angeles and gave his approval for a sitcom deal.

CBS and Paramount Television are exploring the development of a half-hour comedy that could run next year.

Knight, 63, would serve as a consultant and said he might make guest appearances.

"Right now it's still in an embryonic stage," Lindy DeKoven, who would serve as the show's executive producer, told the Lubbock Avalanche-Journal.

The next step is for a writer to go to Lubbock and spend time getting to know Knight at work and at home.

When the script is written, DeKoven will take it to CBS, which will decide whether to make it a pilot.

'Passion' sells more than 4 million copies

The second coming of Mel Gibson's biblical epic "The Passion of the Christ" sold 4.1 million DVD copies by Wednesday after only one day in stores.

While the figure from distributor Fox Home Entertainment is high, it's not quite a record breaker.

"Finding Nemo" holds the No. 1 overall spot for one-day DVD sales with about 8 million.

For a live-action movie, "Spider-Man" holds the one-day record with 7 million.

Although "The Passion" fell short of that, Fox Home Entertainment said it did inaugurate several secondary industry records.

In terms of one-day sales, Fox is describing the movie as the best-selling R-rated film of all time and best-selling non-English language film of all time.

Most DVD sales trackers, however, only divide rankings between animation and live-action.

Paris Hilton designs new line of jewelry

Reality television star and socialite Paris Hilton has created a jewelry line of pink sparkles, stars and hearts.

The Paris Hilton Collection, with pieces ranging in price from $15 to $95, is available online at Amazon.com. It includes earrings, bracelets, necklaces, a belly chain and a belly bar, all in sterling silver and pink crystal.

"I just looked into my style and looked through my jewelry and things I liked and used that when I was designing and sketching," Hilton told the Associated Press Wednesday.

Hilton, 23, worked with a designer and modeled the jewelry shown on the Web site.

"I thought my fans would want to have part of me, something I designed," she said. "A young girl is able to afford it; it looks expensive, but it's not."

Nonviolence rally promotes activism, safety

Jeff Smith, junior in political science, signs up for Campaign for Nonviolence while getting information from Trisha Gott, sophomore in social work, about the organization. The Nonviolence Rally gave students a chance to get involved with all the organizations on campus that deal with nonviolence.

Organizations recruit students

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A string quartet and jazz group entertained guests as they scanned information at Wednesday's Nonviolence Rally in the Union Ballroom.

The 2004 Campaign for Nonviolence kicked off at 11 a.m., featuring a variety of organizations promoting messages of safety and activism.

The League of Women Voters, for example, sponsored a voter registration table.

Getting women to vote can offer a better balance of women's and men's voices, said Karen McCulloh, president of the League of Women Voters.

"It's important to vote, but it's also important to be educated about voting," McCulloh said.

There are many outlets through which students can learn more about the candidates before voting, she said.

Other organizations promoted good citizenship.

Helene Marcoux, adviser of Honesty Integrity Peer Educators, said HIPE's mission is "to promote a culture of integrity."

She said the organization also offers assistance to those who have violated the university's honor code.

Olivia Collins, coordinator of Lou Douglas Lecture Series, said UFM has been involved in supporting Campaign for Nonviolence.

Collins said UFM also offers a teen mentoring program which matches a K-State student with Manhattan middle and high school students.

Susan Allen, director of K-State's Women's Center, said she wants people to realize issues of violence affect the planet and its people.

"The goal of the rally is to teach students ways to practice nonviolence. This can mean giving better homes for Habitat for Humanity, cleaning up a stream, taking courses on non-conflict or mediation," Allen said.

Proactive Educators for the Elimination of Sexual Assault offered information about rape awareness, and buttons were available for a $1 donation.

Josh Ault, president of Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators, said the group was offering information on STD awareness and sexual responsibility. The group also handed out free condoms in support of safer sex.

Victor Force, executive director of the Regional AIDS Project, said he was offering information on HIV, AIDS and STDs, as well as facts about men who have sex with men.

SafeZone is a new program sponsored by the Women's Center that trains teachers to serve as a liaison to offer support for hate crimes, sexual non-violence, gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender issues.

Susan Scott, public relations for Parents, Families and Friends of Lesbians and Gays, said SafeZone is a new organization supporting, advocating and educating all.

Specifically, PFLAG celebrates the diversity of a society that values people of all sexual orientation, she said.

Two awards were given at the rally to recognize individuals who have been leaders in taking steps toward nonviolence.

Cindy Jeffrey received an award for her efforts in creating a nonviolence public service announcement, which was shown at the rally.

Madonna Stallmann was given an award for organizing a community walk for nonviolence.

Jean Ryan, certified national trainer, gave a speech about non-violent communication, which encourages seeing everyone as human, despite the fashion in which they are meeting their needs.

She said she was attending a nonviolence workshop herself when her passion for nonviolence was ignited.

"I have always worked on providing a more just experience for kids and yet didn't have all the tools or knowledge about how to do it," Ryan said.

The rally gave Ryan the chance to pass on her message in hopes of inspiring other students to pursue their own paths towards nonviolence.

"We may not agree with their strategies and yet we can still have compassion for their struggle in getting their needs met. Often we experience the same struggle in our attempt to get our own needs met," Ryan said.

Help can always be found, Allen said.

"We need to intervene in a dysfunctional system to get ahead of violence. We want to step in before the crisis," Allen said.

Hurricane prompts exodus

By John Pain
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MIAMI — Hundreds of thousands of people were told Wednesday to get ready to evacuate as powerful Hurricane Frances crept closer to Florida just weeks after Hurricane Charley's rampage.

It would be the worst double hurricane strike on one state in at least a century.

Generators were hefted off store shelves, along with water, canned goods and emergency supplies as forecasters warned the core of the Category 4 storm with 140-mph top sustained winds was due along Florida's Atlantic coast late Friday or early Saturday. Charley left billions of dollars in damage and 27 people dead when it hit the peninsula Aug. 13.

"I can't emphasize enough how powerful this is. If there's something out there that's going to weaken it, we haven't seen it," National Hurricane Center director Max Mayfield said.

About 300,000 residents in coastal areas of Palm Beach County were told to evacuate starting 2 p.m. today.

In Rockledge, about 45 miles southeast of Orlando, Brevard County told at least 50,000 residents to start evacuating mobile homes and barrier islands this afternoon.

The Kennedy Space Center planned to close today and Friday.

Craig Fugate, director of the state Division of Emergency Management, said steps were being taken to prepare for large-scale evacuations, including possibly reversing lanes of some highways to accommodate fleeing coastal residents.

Frances was nearing the Bahamas with steady strength, but it was expected to fluctuate in intensity and could become a Category 5 storm with top sustained winds of 156 mph or higher, forecasters said. The storm could hit anywhere from South Florida to South Carolina as early as late Friday.

candidates.

"I think most people think if the protesters become obnoxious, then it could actually help Bush in the polls," he said. "But if the protesters are peaceful, then it could help Kerry in the polls."

Grimes said protesters bring an opposing view separate from the public relations propagated inside conventions.

"These conventions are nothing but big PR displays; they're free advertising. They are going to minimize the problems with the party and maximize the positive aspects," he said.

"These protests, from a news point of view, provide balance to all the PR coverage."

Since the protests began, there have been about 1,700 arrests, according to CNN.com. The arrests dealt with disorderly conduct or other convention-related incidents.

Lyman Baker, English instructor, said the arrests may not amount to much later in the criminal justice process.

"We can't just assume that whatever the charges turn out on paper will hold any weight," said Baker, who is a Manhattan Alliance for Peace and Justice board member. "This is all wool that will have to be combed out later."

Protesters are rallying for a number of reasons, Baker said.

"This convention is calling for more of the same policies that we have seen thus far in the Bush administration in the area of environment, in the area of huge spending that is irresponsibly handled, and with the policies like the intensification of the Patriot Act, which already violates civil liberties," he said.

Baker said some of the protesters are speaking out because they feel the Bush administration has lied about too many important issues.

"The whole business of weapons of mass destruction and the connection with al-Qaeda, that never was," he said. "If you lie to the people, if you manipulate the people, you don't really believe in democracy."

Baker, Aistrup and Grimes said these protests are similar to Vietnam War protests.

Baker said MAPJ members participate in protests such as these.

"If our organization had been around in 1968, we would have been in Chicago at the Democratic Convention," he said.

None of the members attended this protest, though, because of school and work obligations, he said.

be shut down," Samarrai said. "They've cost him a lot by doing this."

Out of the 15 employees arrested on Aug. 16, 12 have been deported back to Mexico, and three bonded out of jail and will go to court, said Marilu Cabrera, spokeswoman for the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

One of those deported is a juvenile and was sent home immediately. Ten were deported on Aug. 25, and one was deported on Friday, Aug. 27, she said.

"They were all able to bond out," Cabrera said. "They waived the right to see the judge and went home."

agency reported.

At one point, a girl wearing a floral print dress fled the school, her hand held by a soldier. An older woman followed them.

Ruslan Ayamov, spokesman for North Ossetia's Interior Ministry told The Associated Press that 12 children and one adult managed to escape after hiding in the building's boiler room.

The attack was the latest blamed on secessionist Chechen rebels, coming a day after a suicide bomber killed nine people in Moscow and a week after near-simultaneous explosions blamed on terrorists caused two Russian planes to crash, killing all 90 people on board.

The surge in violence was apparently timed around last Sunday's Chechen presidential election.

"In essence, war has been declared on us, where the enemy is unseen and there is no front," Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov said.

President Vladimir Putin interrupted his working holiday Wednesday in the Black Sea resort of Sochi for a second time and returned to the capital. On arrival at the airport, he held an immediate meeting with the heads of Russia's Interior Ministry and Federal Security Service, the Interfax news agency said.

The standoff began after a ceremony marking the first day of the Russian school year, when it was likely that many parents had accompanied their children.

About 17 militants, men and women, stormed the three-story building and herded captives into the gymnasium. They forced children to stand at the windows and warned they would blow up the school if police intervened, said Alexei Polyansky, a police spokesman for southern Russia.

"I was standing near the gates, music was playing, when I saw three armed people running with guns. At first I thought it was a joke when they fired in the air and we fled," a teenager, Zarubek Tsumartov, said on Russian television.

need to be rock solid, and they got to get going. We depend on them."

Fritz said she was pleased with her team's comeback in the first game.

"I thought we showed excellent composure," Fritz said. "I thought Gabby Guerre contributed to that; she had such a nice calm demeanor and a very strong presence, and I think she was doing everything she could to take over the match."

Guerre, senior setter, led all players with 32 assists. She also had six kills.

Another Wildcat senior who stepped up was outside hitter Michaela Franklin, who finished the night with eight kills.

Franklin said she thought

"I think we had a lot of errors that we don't normally make that we have to work on in practice."

Sandy Werner

nerves contributed to the team's poor play at times.

"It was a good first game to get the jitters out and now we know what to expect," she said. "Our goal is definitely to get better, and I think we did that tonight."

Sophomore outside hitter Sandy Werner, who led all Wildcats with 10 kills, said there were some first-game mistakes, but the team improved as the game progressed.

"I think we had a lot of errors that we don't normally make that we have to work on in practice," she said. "Overall, we got better as the match went on."

Freshman libero Angie Lastra also was a leading contributor, finishing with 11 digs and five service aces.

The next challenge for the Wildcats is the Houston Tournament beginning Friday, which features 2003 NCAA tournament teams California and Maryland.

boiling water, much like dumplings, for ten minutes. This part is important, because crucial enzymes are broken down during this step. If not properly broken down, you can't digest it, and all the time you spent psyching yourself up to taste your tofu will have been wasted.

Next, you filter it, getting soy milk and bean curd. Add calcium sulfate or magnesium chloride as a coagulant, and the milk will separate into curds and whey (no, this isn't what Little Miss Muffet ate while she sat her happy ass on the tuffet).

After this happens, scoop off the curd and cram it into a container lined with cheese-cloth and let it set for a couple of hours. The result resembles a block of cold gravy, and it jiggles when you poke it.

Bush accepts GOP's nomination

By DAVID ESPO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK - President Bush picked apart John Kerry's record on the Iraq war and tax cuts Thursday night and summoned the nation toward victory over terrorism and economic security at home.

"Nothing will hold us back," he said in a Republican National Convention acceptance speech that launched his fall re-election campaign.

"We are staying on the offensive, striking terrorists abroad so we do not have to face them here at home," Bush said in a prime-time address not far from Ground Zero of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

"And we will prevail."

"Four more years, four more years," the delegates chanted as Bush strode alone onto a podium in the middle of a heavily fortified convention hall. His introduction was a video that stirred memories of Sept. 11 - and credited him with "the heart of a president."

"I believe this nation wants steady, consistent, principled leadership, and that is why, with your help, we will win this election," he said.

First Lady Laura Bush joined her husband on stage as he finished his speech, followed by Vice President Dick Cheney and his wife and extended families. On cue, thousands of red, white and blue balloons floated down from the ceiling, mixing with confetti and colored streamers in a made-for-television spectacle.

Bush's speech marked the beginning of a two-month campaign sprint to Election Day, and Kerry clearly couldn't wait. In a ferocious counterattack after a week of GOP convention-week criticism, he called the wartime commander in chief and Vice President Dick Cheney unfit to lead the nation.

"I'm not going to have my commitment to defend this country questioned by those who have refused to serve when they could have and by those who have misled the nation into Iraq," he said in remarks prepared for a midnight campaign appearance in Ohio.

Professor prevails in hearing

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Riley County District judge ruled in favor of a K-State English professor who was once suspected in the death of his ex-wife.

Judge Meryl Wilson ruled Tuesday that the third-party trust company recommended by Thomas Murray's attorney should handle the $300,000 left to the daughter of Murray and his slain ex-wife, Carmin Ross-Murray.

Murray's lawyer, James W. Morrison, said the hearing was a routine procedure.

"Anytime a person who is under 18 is to inherit money, there has to be a conservator," Morrison said.

He said questions had been raised by the child's grandparents and Murray concerning who ought to be conservator.

Ross-Murray was found dead Nov. 14, 2003, in her home outside Lawrence.

Murray originally was thought to be a suspect, but was ruled out by the Douglas County Sheriff's office.

The attorney representing Ross-Murray's family, Terrance J. Campbell, declined to comment on the hearing.

Purple Power Play on Poyntz draws crowds

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Approximately 12,000 Wildcat fans turned out Thursday evening to experience the 20th annual Purple Power Play on Poyntz.

The two-night event kicked off at 5 p.m. with about 50 vendor booths selling K-State merchandise, food and representing local businesses. Willie the Wildcat also was on site for fans to have their picture taken.

One of the most popular attractions in years past has been the inflatable carnival for kids. This year it is bigger and better than ever due to new sponsorship.

"We have really added some punch to the inflatable carnival, which we were able to do thanks to the sponsorship by Capital Federal Savings," said Sara VanAllen, a member of the board of directors for Purple Power Play and marketing director for Manhattan Town Center.

Despite the emphasis on the inflatable carnival, the Purple Power Play is not just geared toward kids.

"Purple Power Play is a very family-oriented event," said Lisa Rockley, board member on Purple Power Play and executive director for Downtown Manhattan, Inc. "Whether you are 2 years old or 80 years old, there's something entertaining for you to do. There is plenty of wholesome fun to be had."

One event especially for adults was a silent auction that ran between 6 p.m. and 7:30 p.m.

The auction included items such as sporting event tickets, including for the St. Louis Cardinals, Country Stampede tickets, Disney World tickets, tailgating packages, and bed and breakfast stays. Proceeds will benefit Manhattan Main Street, including landscaping and holiday decorations.

Other attractions included live music from the band Big Al and the Heavyweights, who took the stage at 6:30 p.m. Tonight The Benders are expected to perform at 7:30 p.m.

Annual Watermelon Bust raises money for Breadbasket

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

More than the watermelon seeds were flying Thursday night at Purple Power Play on Poyntz. Entire watermelons were strewn about.

Lambda Chi fraternity sponsored the Annual Watermelon Bust with 85 watermelons, said Alex Ball, external fraternity president and junior in marketing.

Ball said the philanthropy for the Flint Hills Breadbasket earned about $1,500.

"We felt as though it was very successful," Ball said.

The money for the Breadbasket was raised through T-shirt purchases and entry fees from sororities. Sponsors for the event also helped to earn money for the cause, Ball said.

Ball said this is the first year in at least four years that 11 sororities participated; in the past, it has been 10.

"This is the first time any of our members can remember 11 sororities participating," Ball said.

Web site offers free food to students

By Annette Lawless
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Free food, the holy grail for poor college students, is now in reach for at least another 11 days.

The Web site - www.campusfood.com - offers customers a free meal from participating area dining establishments in exchange for registering on their Web site.

Christina Heller, Campusfood.com marketing associate, said the program has been a hit not only at K-State, but also at other universities around the country.

"Since 1997, we have got over 140 universities involved in the program," Heller said. "With our success, we expect to see those numbers grow."

She said Campusfood.com is the nation's leading network of college restaurants. "We provide a virtual foodcourt, where students can avoid the busy signals and get accurate food orders," Heller said.

The Web site offers more than just free food, Heller said.

"We are simply about providing quality service to university campuses around the country," Heller said.

Militants release hostages

By Mike Eckel
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BESLAN, Russia — Camouflage-clad soldiers carried crying babies away from a school where gunmen holding hundreds of hostages freed at least 26 women and children Thursday during a second day of high drama that kept crowds of distraught relatives on edge.

Men and women wept with disappointment or beamed and hugged each other with relief as a mustached man read the names and ages of the freed hostages over a loudspeaker. Some toddlers among those released were naked, apparently because of the stifling heat in the school, where the hostage-takers refused to allow authorities to deliver water, food and medicine for the captives.

Tensions rose when the militants fired grenades at two cars near the besieged compound. Hours later, a blast that sounded like a grenade fired from a launcher went off during a live report from the scene on Russia's NTV television.

There was little reaction from bystanders to the sound, which came after a day of intermittent fire.

President Vladimir Putin said everything possible would be done to end the "horrible" crisis and save the lives of the children and adults being held at School No. 1 in Beslan, a town in the southern region of North Ossetia.

But despite the release of a few hostages, government officials said the demands of the militants were not clearly defined, making it difficult for negotiators.

It was also unclear whether the siege was linked to the war in Chechnya — along with this week's suicide bombing in Moscow and last week's apparent bombings of two jetliners — or perhaps stemmed from broader ethnic conflicts that are roiling the northern Caucasus region.

Law enforcement sources in North Ossetia and Ingushetia, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the attackers were believed to include Chechens, Ingush, Russians and a North Ossetian suspected of participating in the Ingushetia violence.

Relatives, friends and neighbors who crowded outside barricades blocking access to the school gasped when the hostage release was announced by Lev Dzugayev, an aide to the president of North Ossetia, which borders Chechnya.

Athletic department ends sponsorship of Big Cats

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Saturday's game at KSU Stadium will look the same in most aspects. Players will line the field for kickoff. Willie the Wildcat will do push-ups. But the Big Cats won't be inside the stadium.

The Big Cats were told Aug. 23 the program would not be sponsored by the Athletic Department, said Kendell Powell, third year veterinary medicine student and Big Cat.

Powell said Big Cats receive no funding from the department.

"All our uniforms, candy and still maintenance is paid for by us," Powell said.

Powell said the Big Cats still will be seen at tailgates, K-State events and parades, just not inside the football stadium on their stilts handing out candy and tattoos.

Melynda Stein, assistant director of marketing and promotion, said the decision was made to end the Big Cats program after Al Enlow was hired as the new cheerleading coach.

Stein said Enlow and athletic department officials needed to focus on the cheerleaders and mascot, so sponsorship was cut.

Powell said she and other Big Cats feel as though the department is losing a method of public relations.

"We are the only utility at the games the fans have one-on-one relationships with. We aren't just performing and everyone else watching," Powell said.

Stein said the action was not a personal attack on any of the Big Cats.

"This isn't a negative in any way, we've just made the decision to focus more on what is recognizable in K-State sports," Stein said.

Powell said the Big Cats hope to get a sponsor and become a student organization.

"We didn't require any funding from athletics and we just want someone to back us up," Powell said.

Stein said any future decision to bring Big Cats back will be dependent on the reaction from fans and the direction it takes in the future.

Powell said she is unhappy Big Cats was dismantled, but the members will remain fans.

"The good news is, Big Cats are the 12 most spirited people you'll ever meet. We've consistently had the door slammed in our face, but we will stick around, just not with the cheer squad," Powell said.

Lauren Hatfield, junior in business and pre-law and Big Cat, said the Big Cats planned to go to Purple Power Play on Poyntz and want to stay involved with spirit at athletic events.

"We still really love being what we are to the students and want them to know we will support the department regardless of what has happened to the program," Hatfield said.

Hatfield said the Big Cats met with Dean of Student Life Pat Bosco.

Manhattan airport offers flights to KCI

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Getting to the Kansas City airport quickly just got cheaper.

The Manhattan Regional Airport now offers $99 round-trip flights to Kansas City.

Airport officials hope to add more daily flights soon and increase ridership, which has decreased in the last few years.

"At one time we had nine flights; now we are down to three," Airport Director Russ Johnson said.

Flights with fewer than 12 passengers will be subsidized by a Small Community Air Service Grant. The planes, run by U.S. Airways Express, hold 19 passengers.

"The motivation was the high cost of the current airfare and the reduced service," Johnson said.

"It was to stimulate the market and increase the ridership."

"The schedules and frequency of flights can be brought back to a certain level that can support the airlines to Kansas City.

"Hopefully in the future, we can get larger airplanes or go to different hubs."

The grant is scheduled to last through February 2006.

Johnson said the small air service market has been unable to fully recover from the failing economy and the Sept. 11 attacks.

"Obviously the world changed that day, and aviation has been in a lull," he said. "We are slowly building back that level."

Vice-Chair touts K-State e-mail changes

Alterations to system include automatic deletion of older spam messages

By Scott Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate Vice-Chair Tyson Moore encouraged his fellow senators to spread the word about changes to the K-State email system.

The system, Moore said, underwent a significant upgrade in numerous areas, one of which was the area of spam-filtering.

"The spam-filter puts things into the 'junk folder' when they get marked as spam," Moore said.

"These emails will be deleted if they are more than 14 days old beginning Sep. 6"

Moore and Rebecca Gould, director of the Information Technology Assistance Center, said this does not mean the e-mails would be deleted Sept. 20, but any email that is 14 days old in junk folders on Sept. 6 would be deleted.

In other business, the allocation bills for the Women's Soccer Team and Men's Lacrosse team were passed unanimously on final action.

Big Cats should be praised for dedication

The announcement by the Athletic Department to cut Big Cats has come as a shock to at least the 12 members of the group.

More surprisingly so, the program cost no money to the department except to let the students into the events. It was a hasty move to cut the K-State athletics tradition after a decade.

However, the Big Cats should be applauded for keeping their cool throughout the ordeal. They have continued to attend events without being a part of the program.

Students are right to wonder why a such a cost-effective way to increase student interest in athletic events was eliminated – the ultimate decision seems like there was no reasoning to defend it.

The students paid for their own uniforms, as well as novelties to give out at games and parades. They maintained the stilts, some of which are owned by the athletic department.

Regardless of the administration's decision to nix the Big Cat program, these members have retained their spirit for K-State athletics and should be given the highest regard for their determination to support their school after the decision was made.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

FRIDAY FEEDBACK

E-mail your responses from a K-State Webmail account to feedback@pub.ksu.edu. Names and field of study will be published Friday.

This week's question: What's the most absurd thing you've ever seen at a K-State football game?

"The KU football team."

Darcy Rourk
Alumna

"The most absurd thing I have seen is how upset some fans get when our team makes mistakes, cursing and generally being nasty. There is just no room for that. There is no way that the team can play perfectly each and every game."

David Kersting
Faculty

"Two years ago at the home Nebraska game, there was an inflatable apparatus that resembled the male genitals. On the side, written in purple, was: 'Husk this Nebraska.'"

Amanda Schowengerdt
Junior in architecture

"I think the most absurd thing that happened at a football game was not when a lady came to the game topless, cleverly disguised with Powercat body paint, but when she actually was sent home for being inappropriate. Please bring her back!"

David Foster
Senior in general agriculture

Next week's question: Do you feel like you're getting your money's worth at K-State? Why or why not?

Take this, Canada

Neighboring countries should refrain from taking cheap jabs at each other

I decided to write this column after hearing that a member of the Canadian parliament stated she found Americans to be ... wait, let me see if I have this right ... oh, yes, "bastards" and "idiots."

Now, I may not be fond of what goes on all the time in Canada, but I'll never call them names.

Do I have my biases? Of course, we all do. But me making fun of Canadians and giving them 15 minutes of fame they don't deserve is ridiculous.

It's like they teach you in Principles of Advertising: the No. 1 one brand of a product never mentions the No. 2 brand. Coke never mentions Pepsi. Or take McDonalds. Do they ever mention Burger King in an ad? No. It is like letting them win by mentioning them at all.

Parliament thought if they bad-mouthed the United States, it would get some air time in the news media.

Unfortunately, it worked, and now I have spent a tireless night working on a column to explain how Canadians have it all wrong about us Americans.

After hearing what others had to say on the subject, I realized a couple of things.

Yes, Americans are arrogant. We are a superpower. We think everyone else should apologize and bend over backwards for us.

We expect everyone else in the world to learn our language.

But I have decided, frankly, that Canadians hate us for all the wrong reasons. So why not clear the air between our two nations and get out what they really should hate us for?

1. TAKING AWAY HOCKEY

Let's face it: Canadians rock at hockey. And why shouldn't they? Half of their country is tundra. And can you think of a better hockey player than Wayne Gretzky?

I didn't think so.

America took hockey from its beautiful homeland and turned it into the NHL, where only six Canadian cities actually are host to teams in a league of 30.

Is this right? No. Should sunny Anaheim, Calif., have a better hockey team than Montreal? No. What's next? Are we going to take curling away too? Strike one for America.

2. STEALING ALL THEIR GOOD ENTERTAINMENT

Do you realize how many great Canadians are in Hollywood right now? Mike Myers and Jim Carrey are just a few examples of the pure comedic bliss that has immigrated to the United States during the past few decades.

As a people, I would be offended if my best actors up and left to find greener, warmer pastures. Strike two.

3. THE ADVENT OF "SOUTH PARK" AND THE ANTHEM "BLAME CANADA"

It was Academy Awards history the night that Robin Williams, in all his glory, marched to the genius tune of Trey Parker and Matt Stone. The whole world saw the true feelings of a couple of guys from Colorado – or rather, the feelings of Stan and Kyle's mothers as they combated the evil, flatulent Terrance and Phillip from Canada.

Come on – we portrayed their people as having flip-top heads and caring only about toilet humor. If that isn't a reason to hate us, I don't know what is. Strike three, we're out.

For years, Canadians have harbored hatred for us for reasons out of our control. We are overly confident. We are unapologetic. We think we run the world.

And maybe that's true. But at a time in history such as this, a time of terrorism and war, neighboring countries should build a united front ... and not a wall.

And with the remarks from a certain Canadian parliament member, the first brick has just been laid into place.

Such a shame, too, especially since we have the Stanley Cup, Austin Powers and DVDs of the first four seasons of "South Park" on our side.

International criticism bound to follow contradictions in policy

As an American studying in Spain this summer, I was prepared for a lot of anti-American sentiment. After all, most of the world is less than thrilled with us.

For example, CNN reported Aug. 26 that a member of the Canadian Parliament has referred to Americans as "bastards" and as belonging to "the coalition of the idiots."

According to USA Today, Susan Steele, an American living in London, "has noticed that many Europeans have started using the phrase 'that's American,' which is shorthand, Steele says, for 'not taking anyone else into consideration.'"

There are many reasons that anti-American sentiment is so prevalent – some justified, some not.

Our policies toward Iraq and Israel are widely opposed, and many see us as hypocritical for justifying our actions by appealing to a morality that we don't always seem to follow.

Why is it so important to us to achieve democracy in Iraq, when we often have supported dictatorship when it was in our interest?

Are we truly willing to accept a democracy if it ends up opposing our policies?

Our foreign policy also has made us appear arrogant, since we often act without regard for world opinion.

It is not completely our fault that many dislike our actions. As USA Today notes, "To some degree, the resentment against the United States is inevitable now that it's the only remaining superpower."

An Associated Press article said "Many young South Koreans harbor ... resentment toward the United States because of the long-running U.S. military presence in their country."

As the most powerful nation in the world, we have the responsibility to use that power well, or, at the very least, not misuse it.

One thing I can say for Spain is that though I met many people who strongly opposed our government's actions, none of them held that against me as a person.

Some see Americans as ignorant, and, after being in Spain this summer, I can see their point.

Many, if not most, of the European students at the school where I was studying spoke two or more languages, in addition to Spanish.

A German girl asked me why Americans don't know very much about world history, and the best answer I could give her was that we don't know very much of our own history, either.

Next time, I hope I can think of a better answer. Better yet, I hope that next time, she won't have to ask the question.

Despite all of this no one attacked, threatened, or even insulted me for being an American, which is more than some can say for being a Collegian columnist.

Anti-American sentiment won't go away soon, but we don't have to sit around and helplessly wonder why so many people hate us.

We must take responsibility for our government's actions, and change them if necessary.

We must do our best to make sure that the stereotype of "ignorant Americans" is not true about us, which we can do by taking advantage of classes in foreign languages, geography, history, and political science, and by becoming involved with the international students on our campus.

We don't have to leave the country to increase international understanding.

Student parents struggle with looking after children while attending class

Editor,

I just wanted to say thanks to Shanna Hajek for her column about tolerance for student parents on campus.

I am a student parent. I work full time, and my wife works part time, and we both go to school.

We both have been in the position of having to take our 3-year-old to campus with us, either to the library or the computer lab. It is not a fun experience.

Even on their best behavior, children just naturally can't sit still that long. And when you are getting "the eye" from people around you, it makes you feel terrible. So I definitely try to do it as little as necessary, but sometimes it is the only option we have.

But I wanted to bring your attention to another aspect of being a student parent, that of attendance policies in the classroom. I, by no means, think we should be given more slack than other students. But the situation my wife and I will face is who is going to stay home with our sick 3-year-old - which means who is going to have to miss class.

Most classes have attendance policies that are not usually understanding of student parents in situations like these. The classes that my wife or I will have to miss are an example of this.

We each are allowed only two absences for the semester; after that it is a 10-point deduction for each absence missed. Ten points might not be a lot, but if you're sitting on the line of an A or B, it is a world of difference.

I think class attendance policies should give room for cases such as this. It is already difficult to make up for a missed class; why penalize even more?

Military experience a plus for office

War criminal no candidate for U.S. president

What we need in a president is a military veteran, preferably one that took part in a morally ambiguous Indochinese war.

I agree with the Democrats; civilians are unfit to run a democracy. What we need is a good ol' fashioned military junta.

Enter John Kerry, reporting for duty. — Now here's a guy us evil Rethuglican puppy-eaters can support. Yeah, I know what you're thinking, but with all due respect, kittens are just gristle, and you should know that.

You see, John Kerry is an admitted war criminal.

In 1971 on "Meet the Press," he said, "I committed the same kinds of atrocities as thousands of others in that I shot in free fire zones, fired .50-caliber machine guns... harass-and-interdiction fire, I took part in search-and-destroy missions, in the burning of villages."

John Kerry, war criminal.

I don't know why the Democrats haven't been doing more to get this message out, but presumably "Stronger at Home, Respected Abroad" must've seemed more nuanced than "I burned villages."

In the post-Abu Ghraib world, we need the credibility in higher office that only John Kerry, war criminal, can provide.

Still, we must be careful to separate rhetoric from reality.

I am willing to give Kerry the benefit of the doubt that he is a war criminal, but it's possible he could've been lying to appear stronger.

In fact, the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth dispute the charge that everyone that served in Vietnam is a war criminal.

One of John Kerry's main pieces of proof that he was a war criminal, an illegal sojourn into Cambodia he allegedly took during the war to drop off an undercover CIA agent, has been all but conclusively proven to be a lie.

The only one with intimate knowledge of this surreal boat trip up the Mekong River — Marlon Brando — died mysteriously, at the height of his physical prime this year.

Now, I'm not saying the Bush campaign silenced Brando, but I'm obviously insinuating it.

Michael Moore, documentary, pronto. I can only afford to pay you in pressed ham loaf, but, of course, I don't foresee this being a problem.

My only worry is that Kerry is using his service as a war criminal just to get elected.

It's not like he's above shameless exploitation for political gain.

After a brutal game of pickup basketball during R&R, Kerry would exit with six purple hearts and a Silver Star for "exemplary courage under fire; Most assists per game."

John Kerry, war criminal. Get the message out.

"A more respected broad, burning villages and homes," or whatever it is.

We just can't risk another civilian in the White House.

Wildcats face NCAA teams in tourney

By Kent Hildebrand
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The volleyball team returns to action today for the two-day Houston Tournament.

The 14th-ranked Wildcats (1-0) are coming off a season-opening win against Oral Roberts on Wednesday.

In Houston, they'll face tough competition in the form of 2003 NCAA tournament teams California and Maryland. They also play the Houston Cougars.

Coach Suzie Fritz said the experience gained by playing against Oral Roberts will benefit the Wildcats in their matches this weekend.

"It helps just by getting one under our belts, that's how it helps us," she said. "You get those first game jitters out of the way, and you're just a little bit more comfortable."

The Wildcats' first game is at noon today against Maryland. They play again at 6 tonight against the 10th-ranked California Golden Bears and at 3 p.m. Saturday against Houston.

Fritz said she is somewhat worried about the load of games her team faces early in the season.

After the Houston Tournament, the Wildcats return Tuesday to Manhattan for a match with Wichita State before traveling Thursday to Minnesota for the Diet Coke Invitational, where they play another three matches.

"We're going to play eight matches in 10 days," she said. "So we have some concerns about fatigue and our ability to train within this preseason schedule."

The Wildcats' first game this weekend comes against the Maryland Terrapins, who return 11 letter-winners from last year's squad.

After that battle, K-State faces the 10th-ranked Golden Bears, who return five starters and their top libero from last year's team that went 25-7.

The tournament-hosting Cougars should be a challenge as well, as they return all six of their starters and are picked to finish third in Conference USA this season.

Sophomore outside hitter Sandy Werner said the team is looking forward to the challenge brought by the quality teams in the tournament.

"I think that it's great that we're playing such tough competition," she said. "We can see where we are and what we need to improve on."

NBA | Settlement probable in Kobe Bryant civil suit

In pressing on with her civil suit against NBA star Kobe Bryant, the woman accusing him of rape will not have to meet the higher standard of proof required in a criminal case.

On the other hand, the details of her sex life could come spilling out, along with her medical and psychological records — the very thing she had tried so desperately to avoid in the criminal case.

Legal experts said both sides might be moving toward a settlement to avoid releasing potentially embarrassing or damaging information about not only the 26-year-old accuser but the 26-year-old Los Angeles Lakers star.

As in the criminal case, the relevance of the woman's sexual conduct before and after her encounter with Bryant is likely to be the subject of a legal fight. Bryant's lawyers won that fight in the criminal case. In the civil case, U.S. District Judge Richard Matsch will have to decide.

But Bryant's sexual history also could become evidence. The lawsuit, without elaboration, accuses him of "attempting to commit similar acts of violent sexual assault on females he has just met."

CFB | Hurricane Frances causes postponements

Florida State and Miami will still play in prime time, just four days later than planned.

The nationally televised game, originally scheduled for Monday night, was postponed Thursday as Hurricane Frances moved closer to Florida's east coast. The opener for No. 10 ESPN/USA Today, No. 11 AP Florida's opener against Middle Tennessee State on Saturday also was rescheduled.

The game between the No. 6 ESPN/USA Today, No. 5 AP Seminoles and the No. 5 ESPN/USA Today, No. 6 AP Hurricanes will be played Sept. 10, a Friday night, at the Orange Bowl. The game was the only prime-time game on Labor Day. It still will be televised by ABC.

Florida's home game will be played Oct. 16, athletic director Jeremy Foley said.

Frances, packing winds of 145 mph, is expected to hit the state late Friday or early Saturday. More than a million threatened people were told to clear out Thursday, and residents scrambled to board up homes and stock up on water and gasoline ahead of what could be Florida's mightiest storm in more than a decade.

South Florida's Monday afternoon football game against Pittsburgh at Tampa's Raymond James Stadium still is scheduled for a 4:30 p.m. kickoff, the school said Thursday afternoon.

Miami has had two other games postponed because of hurricanes in the last seven years; one against UCLA was delayed more than two months in 1998 because of Hurricane Georges, and one against Temple was delayed nearly three months in 1999 because of Hurricane Irene.

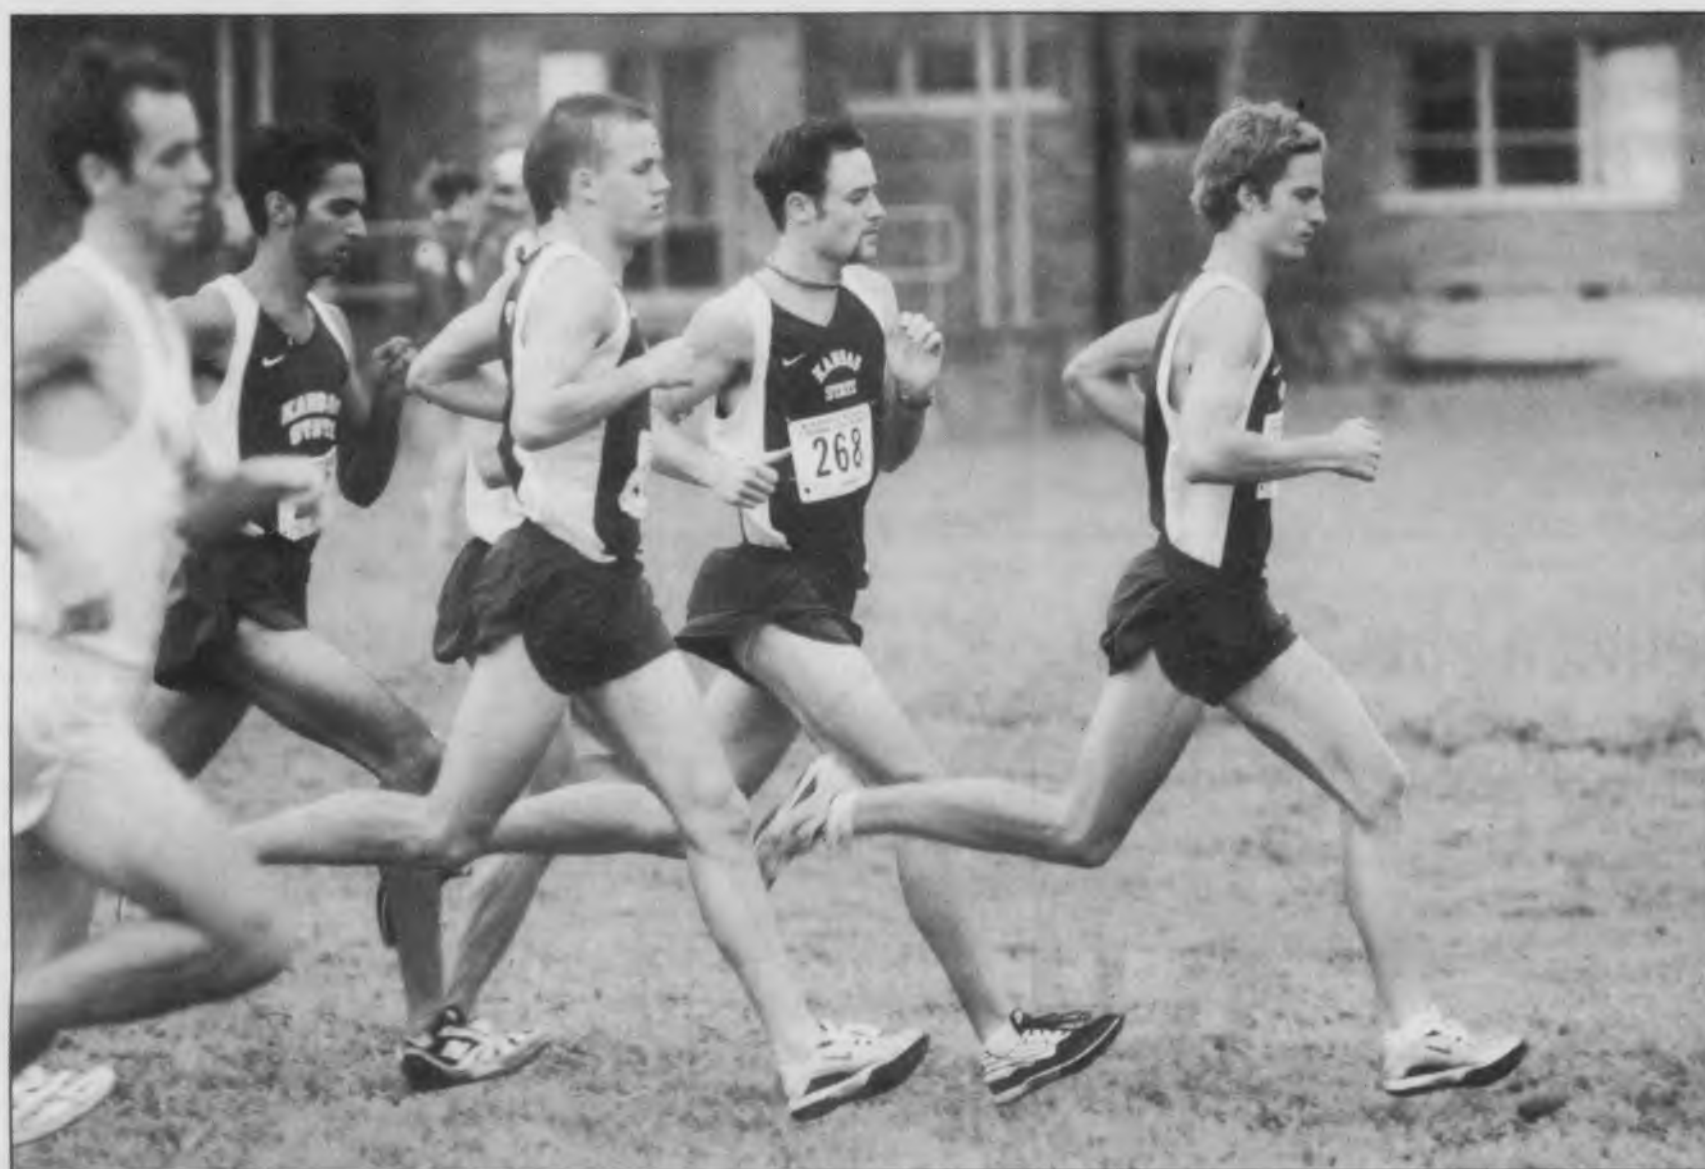

Tennis | Agassi advances, French Open champ falls

Two-time champion Andre Agassi advanced to the third round of the U.S. Open when Florian Mayer retired Thursday.

Agassi was briefly in trouble, splitting the first two sets against Mayer 7-5, 2-6. But after the sixth-seeded Agassi won the third set 6-2 and was leading the fourth 1-0, Mayer was forced to retire with a thigh injury.

French Open champ Gaston Gaudio, seeded No. 9, was defeated by Thomas Johansson 6-1, 2-6, 6-4, 6-4.

Gaudio had his opportunities, thanks largely to 53 unforced errors by Johansson. But he could not take advantage.

Cross country team tests fitness level at invitational

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Going into Saturday's Bob Timmons Invitational, junior cross country runner Joe Moore has one goal sticking in his mind. "Running down as many KU guys as I can," Moore said. "They are our arch-nemesis in every sport, and this meet shouldn't be any different."

While it's true the University of Kansas will be one of the teams in the field, first-year head coach Michael Smith said he is more focused on evaluating his athletes' conditioning.

"It's our first test to see what our fitness level is based on the training we've done over the summer," he said.

At Rim Rock Farm in Lawrence, Kan., the meet will be host to teams from UMKC and ten junior colleges from the region in addition to the Jayhawks and K-State.

Smith said while the competition is not as great as the Big 12, the meet is an opportunity to condition his runners for meets coming later in the season.

"The depth of the competition won't be as great as the Big 12," he said. "The good thing about the course is that the terrain is very similar to the course that we have in Topeka and that's where the Big 12 Championships will be."

On the women's side, junior Lysaira Roman-Del Valle said she is looking forward to running at Rim Rock for the first time.

"I've heard stories about how hard it is from freshman Morgan (Bonds), but I think she likes it there," Roman-Del Valle said.

Roman-Del Valle said her training has prepared her for the conditions at Rim Rock.

"We have been training, and even though it has been very general, it has been a challenge," she

Yellow wristbands cover up shady side of Armstrong's personal life

Yellow has never been a very cool color.

Mention it, and it conjures images of mustard and banana peels and spot and other generally disgusting things.

Yellow is the color of losers and cowards.

Whenever you watch an old Western, one cowboy challenges another to a showdown and says, "What's the matter, are ya yeller?"

Heck, yellow doesn't even look good on a Volkswagen Beetle. For a while, its only redeeming quality was the song Coldplay wrote about it.

But lately, yellow is making a strong push to be cool.

It all started when a cancer survivor from Texas won the Tour de France and donned a yellow jersey in 1999.

Since then, Lance Armstrong has made the yellow jersey all the rage for six years.

Here was a guy who bounced back from testicular cancer and won the world's premier cycling race a record six straight times — not exactly cowardly, and most definitely not a loser.

And he likes yellow.

"Yellow wakes me up in the morning," he said. "Yellow gets me on the bike every day. Yellow has taught me the true meaning of sacrifice. Yellow makes me suffer. Yellow is the reason I'm here."

That quote appears on the Web site www.nike.com/wearyellow/ as part of the Lance Armstrong Foundation and Nike's effort to raise money for cancer research by selling yellow LiveStrong wristbands.

The yellow bands are so cool they're on back order on the LAF Web site. Everyone has one, including Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry. And they're still cool.

The bands symbolize Armstrong's courage to fight back against cancer and ascend to the peak of his sport. They proclaim Armstrong's never-say-die motto and, before the fad is over, they'll raise a chunk of cash for cancer research.

Only thing is, there's one side of Staying the night

Distinct activities help clear up sometimes fuzzy line between dating relationship, shacking

This past summer, my friend Cathy started seeing a new guy. Though she'd known him since her sophomore year, it wasn't until summer that their friendship went to the next level.

The first week or so, things were progressing surprisingly well. They had shacked together a couple of times, but that wasn't the extent of the relationship. They talked on the phone a lot and had real conversations. They hung out without anything more than kissing happening.

She was starting to like him. "I think we might be on the road to dating," she told me. The second week, things were a bit different. Cathy and her guy didn't talk on the phone much, unless it was right before, during or after a night in Aggieville when he wanted to come over. They didn't hang out, unless it remained during or after a night in Aggieville, before he came over. Pretty much the only thing that was the same was that he still was coming over — but that was it. The dynamic in their relationship had shifted.

"Alright," she said, "now we're shacking." I give this example to show there is a distinct difference between the two. I think a lot of people can get confused and automatically think that one leads to the other, or that the two are the same thing. They definitely are not.

Just because you have a space in someone's bed on a regular basis doesn't mean you have a space in their life.

There are several things that can help people tell the difference between shacking and dating. This criteria is what separate the pseudo couples from the real couples.

Perhaps now would be a good time to clarify a few things. First, when two people are shacking together, it doesn't automatically mean they are sleeping together. Lots of people shack without any sex happening.

Second, the shacking I'm talking about isn't the shacking that comes along with dating. I'm talking about the shacking that happens before or in place of dating. If you have a steady someone, these guidelines don't apply to you.

OK, now here we go.

1. Phone calls — If people are just shacking, then phone calls most likely consist of little more than "Can I come over?" These phone calls usually come late at night, often after alcohol has been consumed.

When people are dating, phone calls come frequently, both day and night. The conversations have actual dialogue and substance, not just small talk. People who are dating also talk when they can't see each other, just to connect with the person they care about.

2. Activities — When people are dating, their time together consist of more than just the physical stuff.

They hang out even when they know the other person has to get up early and can't stay over.

They spend whole periods of time where the purpose is to be together, not just get some.

When people are shacking, the purpose of most, if not all, time spent together is to get physical.

3. Public togetherness — How much time spent together in public varies greatly between couples shacking and couples dating. Dating couples go to movies or McDonald's or parties together. Couples shacking usually are seen together only when meeting up to go home together, at the bars or a party.

Figuring out whether you're shacking or dating can be confusing. Obviously, if you're staying over with someone, they like you at least a little.

The gray area comes when you start asking/caring if they like you more than that.

Shacking doesn't have to be problematic.

If both parties are aware of exactly where their relationship stands, then it's fine. Nobody gets hurt and everybody gets some.

Just remember that while some relationships can begin with shacking, not all shacking ends in a relationship — nor is it intended to.

Poignant, humorous tales make Sedaris' latest book a sure hit

David Sedaris' talent for writing is unfair, but so is his inspiration.

Most of the 22 essays in his latest book "Dress Your Family in Corduroy and Denim" are about the other seven members of his family.

Almost all of them are the subject of at least one essay.

In the essay "Repeat After Me" he visits his sister Lisa, who gets upset about his use of their family in his work, and it ends with Sedaris trying to teach his sister's parrot the words "I'm sorry."

He still goes into great detail about her insecurities and failures, all for the public's enjoyment.

In "Hejira," one of the shortest stories in the book, Sedaris tells a poignant account of when his father kicked him out of the house because he's gay.

While some of the stories are potential tearjerkers most are hilarious, especially in the audio version.

His only brother Paul shows up in two essays and provides a redneck, heterosexual balance to Sedaris' gay, hipster.

Sedaris portrays his brother with a whining, nearly incoherent North Carolina accent.

"Dress Your Family in Corduroy" also covers the many jobs and placed at which Sedaris, a perpetual under-achiever, has worked and lived.

In "Blood Work" Sedaris finally receives recognition because of a New York Times article.

The article was about his job cleaning apartments in the city while also writing creative non-fiction.

He comes across a middle-aged, diabetic man who mixed up Sedaris for an erotic cleaning service and masturbated while an embarrassed Sedaris vacuumed the man's bedroom.

Sedaris, who lives in France and travels frequently, tackles cultural differences in the essay "Six to Eight Black Men."

In the essay, Sedaris recalls a Dutch host giving him the details about Christmas in Holland.

The final essay, "Nuit of the Living Dead," is the ultimate example of Sedaris' ability to use imagery and play up coincidences.

With drowned mice on his porch, gruesome true crime novels on his table and big weapons pointed towards pictures of friends on the hearth, Sedaris realizes how spooky his home is when a group of tourists stop by at 3 a.m., needing directions.

If you want to laugh at subject matter as sorted as a mother locking her children out during subzero weather and a neglected, abusive pre-teen neighbor girl, then read "Dress Your Family in Corduroy and Denim," or listen to the spoken word album.

Actress Kathleen Turner would love to see more people become better acquainted with the U.S. Constitution.

"It's very good reading," Turner said.

Turner was a number of celebrities and public figures who gathered at Cooper Union to read the Constitution aloud to a packed crowd.

Others included Alec Baldwin, Richard Gere and Betty Friedman.

Education, enjoyment important when buying engagement rings

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Scott Tatro had his mind made up, and he wasn't going to let anyone change it.

The senior in management information systems and marketing said he was going to surprise his fiancée with a spring break proposal and a princess-cut solitaire engagement ring.

He didn't shop with her for the ring, and he didn't ask for her opinion. He said he just knew — with the help of his roommates.

"My roommate was shopping for a ring at the time and took her with him for ideas, so I got some information out of that," Tatro said. "There was no shopping with her — it had to be a surprise."

And surprised she was.

Tatro said when he pulled out the ring, she was speechless.

There is no systematic way to shop for engagement rings, but the end result should be one that is enjoyable for both the bride and groom, said Dave Thomas, owner of G Thomas Jewelers of downtown Manhattan.

"This is an experience that should be fun and it should be extremely enjoyable," Thomas said.

"There should not be a lot of pressure put on — you need to take that totally out of the scenario."

Tatro said he agreed and suggested taking another per-

Did you know?

The 4 C's of engagement-ring shopping

Carat Weight: The weight and size of the diamond is expressed in carats. One carat is divided into 100 points, so if a diamond is a quarter carat, it is 25 points.

Clarity: Almost all diamonds have small traces of non-crystallized carbon — also called inclusions. These inclusions are the diamond's "fingerprint" and make it unique. The fewer inclusions there are, the rarer and more expensive the stone will be.

Color: Diamonds range in a variety of colors, but the most popular include a clearer color.

Cut: The cut of the diamond affects its sparkle, and in the same case, its beauty. It is the cut that allows the diamond to have the best light reflection.

Source: Michael Danenberg, owner of Danenberg Jewelers

How to

Shop for an engagement ring

1. Educate yourself.

2. Set a budget. Decide on a budget early, and stick with it.

3. Take your time. Remember that it may take four to six weeks for the ring to arrive at the store.

4. Trust your instinct. Shop at a jeweler who you feel comfortable with and has a good reputation in the community.

5. Buy diamonds unmounted. It is important to buy the stone loose, not mounted, so you can inspect the stone.

6. Negotiate. Many stores tend to inflate prices, so shop around.

7. Make paperwork. High-quality and larger-carat diamonds should come with a diamond-grading report. If no report is included, get the ring appraised and insured.

Source: www.theknot.com

"Diamonds are priced per carat," he said.

This means a bigger diamond, likely will cost more.

Similar to pricing different cuts and sizes of meat at the butcher shop, Danenberg said the cost of the diamond depends on the cut and size of the carat.

In addition, clarity — the size, number and location of imperfections on the diamond — also will affect the cost.

A diamond that has very, very small imperfections — those difficult to find even magnetized — will tend to be more expensive than those diamonds which have very small to small imperfections, Danenberg said.

Thomas said although shopping for a ring with a future spouse is a good idea, it is not always necessary.

"He needs to know a few particulars, such as does she like white gold, or does she like yellow gold, does she like something plain, or does she want something with side stones," he said.

And despite myths of spending one to two month's salary on the engagement rings, both Danenberg and Thomas said their stores are committed to helping buyers purchase rings within their budget.

"The ring should fit in a price range that he has predetermined," Thomas said. "A dollar amount does not represent what that relationship means."

Fall nuptials incorporate range of seasonal colors

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fall's brilliant colors offer couples more options for their weddings.

Alan Honey, owner of Alan Honey Photography, said several couples plan their weddings for the fall to get good pictures.

"Obviously the colors of the leaves make great pictures," he said.

"The light is also better because it gets darker earlier, so the colors are more intense, and the sky is a deeper blue."

"The best sample photographs always come from the fall."

Wedding dresses vary in the fall as well.

Laura Rothlisberger, owner of Celebrations of the Heart, said while strapless styles are always popular, not all brides have dresses that are pure white this time of year.

"This time of year we tend to see more of a candlelight or pearl color," she said.

Rothlisberger said some wedding dresses have colored trim on them.

"It hasn't really caught on in the Midwest yet, but eventually more brides will be wearing them," she said.

Colors like brown and pink are popular for bridesmaids' dresses, Rothlisberger said.

Flowers tend to be darker hues for fall weddings, said Michele Wickwar, floral designer at Brown's Floral and Gift in Junction City.

"I find that brides tend to stick to more traditional colors like burgundy and navy, she said."

The typical flowers tend to be roses and carnations, and more brides are having bouquets that are tied with a simple ribbon, Wickwar said.

Some couples vary from the norm, however.

"One time we had a couple who was getting married on Halloween who wanted orange roses with black leaves," Wickwar said.

Sept. 11 weddings face controversy

By Sam Dolnick
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

"We're really excited about having a celebration of love on that day to help restore a sense of goodness to the world."

Lynne Vellucci
FUTURE BRIDE

NEW YORK — Rich Rowland Jr. and Kim Terhune wanted to get married in September and settled on the second Saturday of the month: Sept. 11.

The date may have given other couples pause, but Rowland, 27, and Terhune, 26, of Greenville, N.C., decided to "try and make it a happier day."

Not everyone approved of their decision.

"May all bad luck be bestowed upon you for this," someone who knew them wrote anonymously in the couple's on-line wedding guestbook. "You are wrong in choosing the date you have chosen."

In fact, Rowland and Terhune are in the minority. Many couples avoid the day.

According to New York-based www.theknot.com, the largest wedding site on the Internet, 66 percent fewer couples have registered on the site for weddings on Sept. 11 than on the surrounding Saturdays. Also, this year's registrations reflect a 55 percent drop from the second Saturday of September in 2003, and a 65 percent drop from the second Saturday of September 2002.

The empty datebooks of wedding planners in California, Missouri, Virginia and New York confirm those numbers.

"No one wants to see that date in print on a card or on an invitation," said JoAnn Gregoli, owner of Elegant Occasions, a Manhattan, NY wedding-planning business. "It just brings back bad memories."

With the 11th of September falling on a Saturday this year for the first time since the terrorist attacks, couples nationwide have struggled to decide whether they, and their guests, are ready to celebrate on a date so firmly rooted in tragedy.

Interviews with more than a dozen couples who've scheduled weddings for Sept. 11 reveal a range of reasons why. For some it was the most convenient date. For others it was a way to take advantage of steep discounts driven by a lack of business.

A few, like Lynne Vellucci and James Buongiorno, are using their wedding date to make a statement about the terrorist attacks.

"We're really excited about having a celebration of love on that day to help restore a sense of goodness to the world," said Vellucci.

Vellucci, 35, and Buongiorno, 38, both of Brooklyn, didn't set out to marry on Sept. 11. But when they learned that day worked best for logistical reasons, they "realized it was something we wanted to do," Vellucci said.

"It's a kind of renewal to focus on all the love and happiness in the world," she added.

Vellucci worked at Deutsche

Bank across the street from the World Trade Center when the buildings were struck. She watched the towers burn and choked on the trade center's smoke.

While planning the wedding, in a Brooklyn church and a reception on Long Island, Vellucci said some vendors, apparently uncomfortable with the idea of a Sept. 11 wedding, gave her sideways glances.

"It made me so sad that people thought I was being disrespectful," the bride-to-be said.

"I would look at them and say, 'We selected this day for a reason.'"

The Rev. Charles Rush, who will perform a wedding at Christ Church in Summit, N.J., on the afternoon of Sept. 11 after attending a vigil marking the anniversary of the attacks in the morning, said he believed the meaning of Sept. 11 was evolving.

"There comes a point where this day has to transition out of grief and shock for the nation and into something more positive," Rush said.

The couple he'll marry, Rachael Rafanello, 32, and Dean Wright, 36, said they chose Sept. 11 in part for economic reasons, reserving the Grand Summit Hotel for substantially less than it would have cost later in the month.

A wedding reception for 135 guests, a five-course meal, a martini slide made out of ice, cocktail hour and a dessert buffet at the Tudor-style hotel normally costs around $32,000, said Rafanello. She got all that plus a few extras for about $23,000, because she booked for Sept. 11. Without the discount, she said, she would have had to scale back her wedding plans.

"When in your lifetime can you get a deal like that?" asked Rafanello.

There's also the matter of trying to pick a date that works with the schedules of family, caterers, out-of-town guests and sites.

"My parish is in very high demand, and when we called there weren't many dates available, and that was one of them," said Jennifer Wade, 30, of Long Branch, N.J., who will wed David Baxter, 30, of West Long Branch, N.J., in St. Catherine's Church in Spring Lake, N.J.

With the date approaching, many couples said thoughts of Sept. 11 have largely been trumped by the work of selecting menus, seating charts, flowers and the countless other details that go into planning a wedding.

There's no avoiding the memory of Sept. 11, but couples like Terhune and Rowland hope their exchange of marriage vows will outshine it.

"It's not like we're trying to be unpatriotic," Terhune said. "We were just like, 'Well, at least maybe we'll bring some happiness to someone's day.'"

Affordable honeymoons available for couples

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

How to Save money on your honeymoon

1. Plan, plan, plan. Include the honeymoon expenses in the wedding budget. This way you can plan on funding the honeymoon.

2. Stay in the United States. By staying inside the United States, you can save on airfare and hotel costs.

3. Road trip it. Pick a destination close enough to drive to rather than spending money on expensive airline tickets and car rental fees.

4. Register for the honeymoon. Let your friends and family know they have the option of contributing money toward the honeymoon rather than buying a gift.

5. Use frequent flyer miles. Find someone in your family that flies frequently and would be willing to donate their frequent flier miles toward your honeymoon.

6. Honeymoon later. If you're getting married during a prime wedding season (May through September), consider taking the honeymoon later in the year, when costs aren't so overwhelming.

Did you know? Hot spots for honeymoons

Bob Henderson, owner of Midway Travel Service in Junction City, said the Mayan Riviera in Mexico, located about 40 minutes from Cancun, is the most popular honeymoon of choice.

"They fly into Cancun, and then they are taken to the big, newer resorts down the coasts," he said. "It's not the hustle and bustle of Cancun, but more of the peace and quiet that they're looking for."

Hawaii is also a popular destination, where couples typically spend a night or two in Honolulu, then go to a quieter island, Henderson said.

Lisa Dolan, owner of MDC Travel in Olathe, Kan., said Sandals resort islands are popular among many couples. Such islands include Jamaica and parts of the Caribbean.

Las Vegas is also a hot spot, she said. "Some people like to get married in Las Vegas and just stay there for their honeymoon," she said.

their honeymoon, the better chance they have to save money on airline tickets, Henderson said.

"With everybody getting married in June, those flights fill up so quickly, and usually that's what makes the honeymoon more expensive or less — it's the airfare," he said.

Typically, Henderson said airfares are dependent on availability. For example, as soon as all air seats go on availability, most airlines will sell their first set of tickets for the cheapest price. As tickets sell, airlines could increase the cost of the tickets, he said.

Working through a travel agent also can save couples money and reassure them of the quality and value of a trip, both Dolan and Henderson said.

Henderson said he prefers that couples work with a travel agent despite recent trends of booking honeymoons on the Internet.

"You have to be careful on the Internet," he said. "All it takes is one mistake, and if something goes wrong, who are you going to call? We're almost always the same price, if not cheaper, because we know the tricks a little bit better."

Dolan agreed and said shopping around for a honeymoon on the Internet can be deceptive.

"If you do the Internet, you just look at the picture, and you don't know what's there," she said.

The earlier the couple books vance, if not earlier, depending on the location and time of year.

"If they're going off season, they're OK to book one month in advance," Dolan said. "But if they're going on-season, some people book six months in advance to save money."

Dolan said the earlier the honeymoon is booked, the earlier er the couple can begin saving money toward the vacation.

"The couple can start saving money for the honeymoon, and they don't have to pay in full right away," she said. "They have to pay the deposit, but then the balance usually is 45 days before the honeymoon."

COLUMN | Armstrong lacked drive to save marriage

Armstrong they don't represent. A side that's not so cool and courageous. The side that divorced his wife Kristin and left her with their three children while he trains.

The Armstrongs said their split last year was a mutual decision, but Lance wasted little time before hooking up with rock star Sheryl Crow and conveniently leaving the kids with Kristin.

Lance and Kristin met not long after he was diagnosed with cancer.

She was there with him for the treatments and the rehab, gave birth to their three children and was by his side as he trained for and raced in his first five Tour de France victories.

Then came some problems, the divorce and Crow. Maybe in that order, maybe not.

"We've had six homes, three languages, two countries, one cancer comeback, three children, four Tour de France wins and one rise to celebrity," Kristin said after the couple had separated for a brief time in 2003. "You're not supposed to cram such a huge amount of events into such a small period of time."

So Kristin was tired of the strain of being married to a sports star, and all Lance wanted to do was have some fun with Crow.

They said the divorce was in the best interest of the children.

Lance even said he and Kristin were still good friends after announcing the divorce.

"The craziest thing is, we're closer now and better friends than ever before. We're truly committed to maintaining a good relationship, but not a marriage," he said.

If he's "committed" to having a good relationship with Kristin and being there for the kids, that's great. Let's just hope it's the same commitment he had to beat cancer and win six Tours, and not the commitment he had for marriage.

Ironically, the day the Armstrongs announced their divorce, the U.S. House of Representatives congratulated Lance on his fifth tour win.

"This distinguished body is recognizing the inspirational Lance Armstrong and his unbelievable courage, grit and determination," Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., said.

If only he displayed a little more courage, grit and determination in all aspects of his life.

As for Kristin, she's at home in Austin, Texas, with the three children.

I wonder if she bought one of the cool yellow wristbands.

Officials warn of e-mail scams

By Karthik Reddy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The latest e-mail scam is a variation of the 20-year-old "Nigerian Scam" or "419 Letter."

People running the scam claim to have access to large sums of money and promise a hefty payment to anyone willing to provide a bank account for transferring this money.

The victims then would become embroiled in an endless maze of legal jargon and other official-looking documents requiring them to pay money.

Since this scam is old and has been in existence for several years, people are less likely to be taken in by it, said Sgt. Don Stubbings of the K-State Police Department.

"Someone new may take the offer seriously, but most people just delete the e-mail. However, since the scam is still going on, it might be successful in some other areas," he said.

When students were questioned about the scam, most said it was an inconvenience rather than a serious threat.

"I was at first excited at the prospect when I received the mail, but common sense prevailed. Now, it is just an harmless, albeit annoying occurrence," said Mazharuddin Mohammad, graduate student in computer information systems.

Another new yet more dangerous scam occurred on campus in mid-August.

An anonymous caller, pretending to be a representative of the U.S. Department of Education, contacted students on campus by telephone, said Larry Moeder, director of the Office of Admissions and Student Financial Assistance.

The caller attempted to obtain their bank account numbers by promising that their student loans would be replaced by scholarship grants, said Moeder.

In order to receive this grant, the students were required to pay a fee and divulge their bank account numbers.

There were no reports of any students in K-State who had actually lost any money, though several people on campus received phone calls, he said.

said. "After the meet, I will know where I am and I will look forward after that and find out what I have to do to get better."

Moore said the goal for the team is finding out how prepared it is for actual competition.

"We just started team training three weeks ago, so were still cramming it in and seeing what we can do as a team," he said.

Smith said the course distance is different than the other meets Wildcats will compete in later in the season.

"It's a little shorter than what we'll run later on in the year," Smith said.

Smith said getting out and competing with other teams will help his runners in the early stages of the season.

"We're looking forward to doing something other than running by ourselves," Smith said.

"I think they just want to compete."

The meet starts at 9 a.m. with the men's 8K race, followed by the women's 5K race at 10 a.m.

POWER PLAY | Snyder speech, pep rally performances highlight event

The pep rally, which began at 8:15, included performances by the K-State cheerleaders and the Classy Cats.

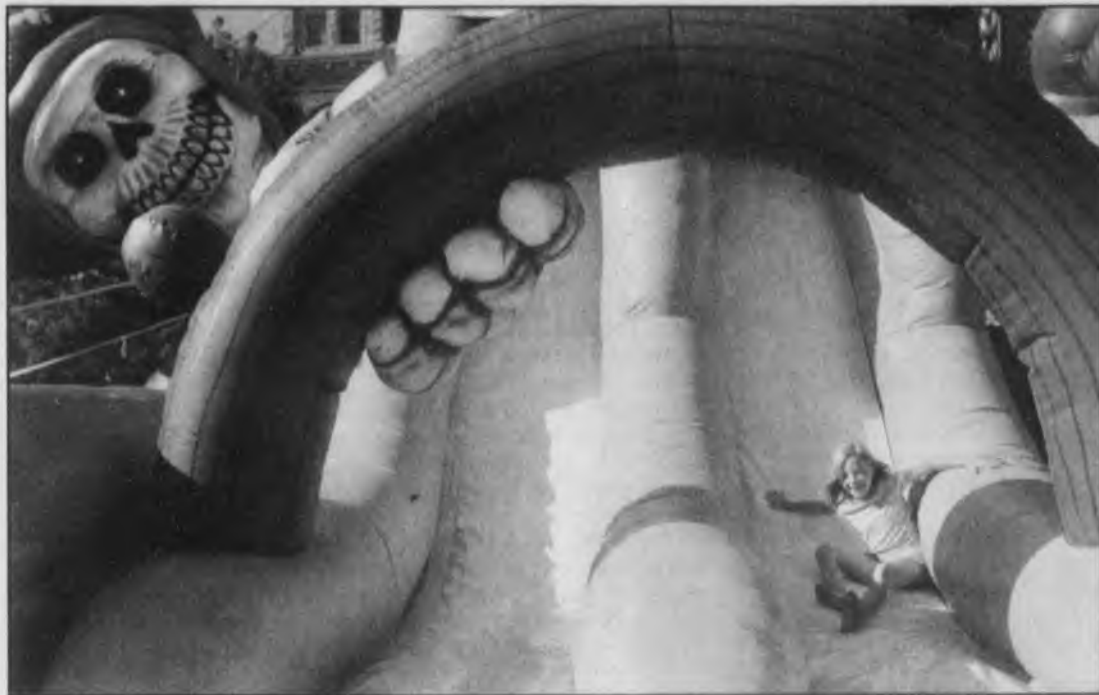

Immediately following, Coach Bill Snyder spoke briefly, introducing this year's seniors and expressing his appreciation to the fans.

"The spirit here is different than it is perhaps anywhere else in the country," Snyder said. "We really appreciate our fans."

Many K-State students turned out later in the evening just to catch the pep rally and hear Snyder and the captains speak.

"I came out to hear the captains talk and to get excited about the season. I hope for a repeat as Big 12 Champs," Steve Walterscheid, a sophomore in architecture, said.

Snyder said this is at least the 16th year he has attended Purple Power Play.

game, watermelon eating contest, wars with watermelons and a relay.

Ashley Lawyer, junior in advertising and Delta Delta Delta sorority member, said she and her sorority sisters were hiding behind a building because Pi Phi sorority had started a watermelon war with them.

"We hit them with a watermelon from behind a van, and now we are hiding from them," Lawyer said.

Ashok Platro, sophomore in electrical engineering and Lambda Chi fraternity coach for Alpha Chi Omega sorority, said his first year at the Watermelon Bust was better than expected.

"It has been a blast, you haven't had any fun until you've gotten messy," Platro said.

Colleen Loo, freshman in bio-chemistry and chemistry and Alpha Delta Pi sorority member, was the third leg in the relay. She was in charge of searching through a vat of watermelon pieces for a flag.

Loo had troubles finding the flag, spending about 30 seconds longer than any other team.

"I thought it wasn't in there, because I saw some guys standing with one in their hand. I honestly didn't think I would find it," Loo said.

Ashton Wright, freshman in marketing and advertising and Chi Omega sorority member, said she was disappointed she did not get to participate in the watermelon eating contest.

"I've still had lots of fun, but I didn't get to finish eating watermelon — they ran out,"

Wright said.

Glen and Becky Gillihan, Waterville, Kan., residents, watched the Watermelon Bust.

"We are still trying to figure out what is going on," Becky said.

Lindsey Shellenberger, sophomore in chemistry and Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority member, said she was hit mostly when she did not expect it.

"I got hit by the watermelon so many times when I wasn't looking," Shellenberger said. "The ones in the face were the toughest hits to take."

new service.

"I hate ordering food and then getting it an hour later with a mistake on the order," said Alejandro Suñé, freshman in secondary education. "I think this site can prevent that."

Heller said the satisfaction of customers like Suñé is the motivation behind the site.

"We want businesses and customers to be satisfied, and we believe that K-State students are enjoying the free food right now," she said. "Businesses can also enjoy this solid marketing strategy and innovative form of advertising."

Andrew LeValley, freshman in open-option, said the service is a good way to try businesses around town.

"I'm a freshman, and it will take me a while to find good food around Manhattan," LeValley said. "If I get it for free, I am probably more prone to try it out."

Bryan Warmock, Pita Pit manager, said the program benefits businesses, too.

"We joined the program, because we have heard of the success it's been in the past," said Warmock. "This is probably the best way to get our name out there in comparison to other forms of advertising."

Michael Wisner, Quizno's assistant manager, said the free food deal isn't a huge loss for businesses involved.

"We get reimbursed with a stipend for every free item sold through the Web site," he said.

"However, once our free food contact ends with the site, we then pay Campusfood.com a rate for having our services through them."

Heller said the launch of Campusfood.com at K-State has been one of the top campaigns to date.

Other businesses involved with Campusfood.com are experiencing the same advantages.

"The program is definitely a success on the marketing aspect of things," Jacob Rowell, Domino's Pizza assistant manager, said. "We are getting a lot of responses, in particular with the residence halls."

Cole Worley, Goodnow Hall community assistant, said many students in his hall have responded to the program.

"I have seen more pizza come through here than any other time of year," Worley said.

"Some groups are ordering pizza together, and this weekend I plan on ordering some pizza with my friends," he said. "Although I'm a solid customer with Gumby's, sometimes it is nice to get things for free."

The deals have put extra stress on restaurant staff, said Patrick Garrard, Gumby's Pizza and Pub shift leader/manager.

"Sales are going crazy, and deliveries have been really busy," Garrard said.

Students enjoy the free food, deliveries are enjoying the large amount of tips, and his restaurant is enjoying the business exposure, said Garrard.

"Everyone leaves this program a winner," he said.

CONVENTION | Bush unveils election advertising campaign

Kerry won five military medals in the Vietnam War; Bush was stateside in the National Guard and Cheney's five draft-era deferments kept him out of the service.

The Bush-Cheney campaign readied a new general election advertising campaign to build on elements in his convention speech. In the commercials, Bush vows to "spread ownership and opportunity," "make our economy more job friendly" and help lower health care costs.

Locked in a tight race, the president underscored his differences with Kerry on issues of war, tax cuts, values and more. At the same time, he used terms less incendiary than those wielded by Cheney or Sen. Zell Miller, D-Ga., from the convention podium Wednesday night.

Bush said Kerry and Democratic vice presidential candidate John Edwards had both voted against $87 billion in aid for "troops doing battle in Afghanistan and Iraq." "When asked to explain his vote, the senator (Kerry) said, 'I actually did vote for the $87 billion before I voted against it.' Then he said he was 'proud of that vote.'"

2.5 million evacuated from Florida

By Tim Reynolds
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PORT ST. LUCIE, Fla. — Residents and tourists in cars, trucks and campers clogged highways Thursday in the biggest evacuation ever ordered in Florida, fleeing inland as Hurricane Frances threatened the state with its second battering in three weeks.

About 2.5 million residents were told to clear out ahead of what could be the most powerful storm to hit Florida in a decade. Other people in the 300-mile stretch covered by the hurricane warning rushed to fortify their homes with plywood and storm shutters, and buy water, gas and canned food.

Already a Category 4 storm with 140 mph winds and the potential to push ashore waves up to 15 feet high, Frances could make itself felt in the state by midmorning Friday.

At 5 p.m. EDT, the hurricane was centered 375 miles southeast of West Palm Beach and was moving northwest at close to 10 mph. Hurricane-force winds extended up to 80 miles from its center.

This could be the first time since 1950 that two major storms have hit Florida so close together. On Aug. 13, Hurricane Charley splintered billions of dollars worth of homes, knocked out power to hundreds of thousands and killed 27 people when it tore across the state.

Charley's example — and Frances' tremendous size, at 1,000 miles across, or about as big as the state of Texas — prodded people like Linda Silvestri, 58, to get out of the way. Silvestri, who lives in Palm Bay on the central Florida coast, headed inland to Gainesville to be near a hospital because she just received a kidney transplant.

"I hope I have a house when I get back," she said.

The hurricane warning covered most of the state's eastern coast, from Florida City, near the state's southern tip, to Flagler Beach, north of Daytona Beach. Forecasters could not say with certainty where Frances would come ashore, just that it would strike late Friday or early Saturday.

About 14.6 million of Florida's 17 million people live in the areas under hurricane watches and warnings.

Residents and tourists streamed inland in bumper-to-bumper traffic. Traffic backed up for miles on sections of Interstate 95, the main north-south highway along the state's east coast, and was also heavy on parts of I-4, which crosses the peninsula to connect Daytona Beach, Orlando and Tampa.

Geoff Connors of Fort Pierce sat in a line of about 50 cars slowly merging onto I-95 in Fort Pierce.

He had enough cash and clothes to get through about five days, though he wasn't sure where he would end up.

"I figured it was smarter to get out of here now. It was a snap decision," Connors said.

Most people who were told to leave were in South Florida — 300,000 in Palm Beach County, 250,000 in Broward County and 320,000 in Miami-Dade County. All of Miami Beach, with its Art Deco hotels and flashy nightclubs and restaurants, was under an evacuation order.

Businesses welcome recent college graduates remaining in Manhattan for employment

By Joanna Rubick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan may not be students' first choice when searching for a job, but surveys show K-State students will consider it.

According to a study from May 2004, 46 percent of K-State juniors and seniors would stay in the Manhattan area for a job with a competitive pay.

The study was done by MBA students in the business practicum course and the Economic Development Division of the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce.

Lyle Butler, Chamber president, said he thought the numbers were surprising.

"I found them to be much more than I expected, although I had nothing to base it on," he said. "I was extremely pleased."

Manhattan has been working on bringing more businesses and professional level jobs to the area, he said.

"We are using this tool to let employers know that there is a workforce that is continually resupplies itself," Butler said.

Since the study was done recently, Manhattan hasn't had the chance to use the study to its advantage, he said.

"We just now started using it," he said. "I am confident that it is going to assist us."

"What we're hoping that the K-State study does is to help existing businesses realize what workforce they have and to help bring new businesses in."

Mike Loesch, May 2004 graduate, said he chose to stay in Manhattan because he already had a job.

"I decided to stay in Manhattan because I had a professional job," he said.

Loesch works at Bruce McMillan American Institute of Architects, Architects PA, as an associate for AIA and an intern. He said he got the job when McMillan lectured in one of his classes.

Thus far, Loesch said he is content in Manhattan, but he would consider venturing beyond Manhattan.

"At times it'd be nice. It just depends on the job market," he said.

"Otherwise, I'd like to be around where I can go buy stuff."

Loesch said working for a smaller firm has been beneficial.

"It depends, if you are in a situation like I am, it's a small firm, so you get to learn the whole process," he said. "In a larger firm, you may work in a narrower area."

Sarah Dorward, junior in marketing and management, said she would accept a job in Manhattan if it paid well.

"If it was compared to a job in Kansas City, it would have to pay more," she said.

"I like living in a big city rather than a small town."

Silent leader

The race for the Heisman begins

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Senior running back Darren Sproles could care less about the awards and accolades. What he does care about is his team.

"I don't care about the Heisman," Sproles said at K-State's Media Day in August. "I just want to help the team."

During his junior season, the 5-foot-7-inch Olathe, Kan., native led the nation in rushing with 1,986 yards on 306 attempts and all-purpose yards with 2,735 on his way to a fifth-place finish in the Heisman voting. Sproles also set 17 individual, season and career school records in 2003.

Sophomore back-up running back Donnie Anders said it is an honor to learn from Sproles.

"It's exciting to be able to say that I am behind a Heisman Trophy candidate," Anders said. "He's just an amazing back."

Once again, Sproles is a top contender for the Heisman Trophy, along with the Doak Walker Award, Walter Camp Trophy and the Maxwell Trophy. If he receives the Heisman, Sproles would be the first player in K-State's 109-year football history to win the award as the nation's top collegiate player.

Sproles also comes into his senior season with a chance to break the all-time Big 12 Conference rushing record. Sproles is 1,628 yards behind the Big 12's career leading rusher, former Texas star Ricky Williams.

With K-State opponents likely crowding the line of scrimmage to stuff the explosive Sproles, Coach Bill Snyder said the running back's work in the weight room over the summer will help him counter defenses stacking the box with eight or more defenders.

"He's one of those young guys if you say 'Darren this is important,' he says 'this is important,' and he goes and does it," Snyder said. "He's that way in the weight room, he's that way in virtually all aspects of his life."

"He's a more physical player. Darren Sproles can run north and south and is a good down hill runner."

Running backs coach Michael Smith said Sproles is never satisfied with his performances.

"He is always out there competing," Smith said. "He just keeps getting better. He just wants to play football and run the ball."

Along with the challenge of leading the Wildcats to a second straight conference title, Sproles must deal with the tragic loss of his mother, Annette, who died of cancer this spring.

5 players on national watch list

By Michael Ashford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Many K-State players are earning national recognition this preseason for their contributions to the team.

By putting up impressive stats last year, several K-State players enter this season as candidates for various prestigious trophies to be handed out at the end of the season.

Senior running back Darren Sproles, while being a preseason Heisman Trophy contender, also has been added to the watch lists for the Doak Walker Award, given to the nation's top running back, the Walter Camp Player of the Year Award and the Maxwell Trophy.

Middle linebacker Ted Sims, whose 79 tackles from a year ago ranked fifth on the team, has been added to the watch list for the Butkus Award, given annually to the nation's top linebacker.

After not starting until the Texas game a year ago, Coach Bill Snyder says it is Sims' experience that will help him flourish in 2004.

"Ted, at that position, was young last year. He's young this year, but with experience," Snyder said. "Obviously being young, you have the capacity to grow."

A breakout performance from defensive tackle Jermaine Berry, who totaled seven sacks and led all defensive linemen with 82 tackles in 2003, earned him a spot on three award watch lists.

The Nagurski Award, given to the nation's best defensive player, the Outland Trophy, given to the best interior lineman, and the Lombardi Award, given to the best linebacker/lineman, all have Berry on their preseason watch lists.

Berry said the recognition is nice, but he is more focused on helping his team win.

"Those awards are major accomplishments,

LEADER OF THE PACK

Dylan Meier will make his 1st start for the Wildcats on Saturday

By Josh Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Talk filled the offseason.

Who would start as quarterback for the Wildcats in 2004 — redshirt sophomore Dylan Meier or sophomore transfer Allen Webb?

Despite being No. 1 on the depth chart since spring practice, questions circulated whether Meier would make his first career start in 12th-ranked K-State's season opener against Western Kentucky at 6 p.m. Saturday at KSU Stadium.

Let Coach Bill Snyder put any doubt to rest.

"Sometimes you guys don't listen," Snyder said at Tuesday's press conference. "He was the guy in the spring and the guy in the off-season program."

"Dylan is our No. 1 quarterback."

So Meier leads the Wildcats at the beginning of their journey to repeat as Big 12 Conference champions.

Though the 6-foot-3, 210-pound Pittsburg, Kan., native has only attempted eight passes in his collegiate career, he said he is prepared for the challenge ahead.

"I've always had the mindset to get better each practice, and I really think in terms of one day at a time, one practice at a time, one throw at a time," Meier said. "I've always had that mentality and never really over-looked anything."

Meier fills the shoes of Eli Roberson, who led the K-State offense to 36.6 points per game last season — good for ninth in the country.

Senior tight end Brian Casey said the team believes Meier can produce similar results.

Lindsey Bauman | COLLEGIAN
Dylan Meier drops back to make a pass during the Spring Game at KSU Stadium. Need more text here to fill out the outline. Mention that Meier this game will be Meier first start at quarterback for the Wildcats.

"We're real confident in Dylan," he said. "We expect him to do the same thing Eli did last year — lead the team to victories."

If history is on the Wildcats' side, Meier should be able to do just that on Saturday.

In Snyder's 15 seasons, first-time starting quarterbacks are a combined 9-2, and they are 7-0 when that first start comes in the season-opener.

Also in Meier's favor is his supporting cast on offense.

Senior running back and Heisman Trophy contender Darren Sproles, junior fullback Victor

Mann, senior tight end Brian Casey and a talented, fast receiving corps should help ease Meier's transition into the starting role.

Senior center Mike Johnson said Meier already has displayed an air of confidence around his most experienced peers.

"As far as giving Dylan a comfort level, I think he's already got it," Johnson said. "He's one of the most comfortable guys in the huddle. He's always positive and ready to do something."

Going into the season, Snyder said Meier was unfazed by the perceived competition with Webb.

"He's probably above and beyond the quarterbacks we've had at that age. Certainly his game-management skills are as high as the senior quarterbacks we've had."

Del Miller
CO-OFFENSIVE COORDINATOR

"I don't think he feels, 'who's behind me, who's in front of me,'" he said. "I think what he works with, and appropriately so, is 'here's our offense, and here's how I need to manage it'."

Coaches and players alike said Meier's grasp of the offense and ability to run the team on the field were the young quarterback's greatest attributes.

Co-offensive coordinator Del Miller said Meier plays above his youth.

"He's probably above and beyond the quarterbacks we've had at that age," he said. "Certainly his game-management skills are as high as the senior quarterbacks we've had."

When Meier takes the field Saturday for the first time as a starter, a heavy weight of expectations will be on his shoulders.

"It's exciting. It's what you dream about from the first time you hold a ball," he said.

THEY SAID IT

"We can't come into the season with big heads just because of whatever happened last year. We can't dwell on the past."

OFFENSE

A big shocker here. Senior running back Darren Sproles will be the focal point of the Wildcats' offensive game plan Saturday. Sproles, the nation's leading rusher, will have a typical big day despite facing a Western Kentucky defense that ranked eighth against the run in Division I-AA last season. The unknown factor is the passing game. With some new receivers and a new starting quarterback, there are some question marks. But when the Wildcats pass, the depth and speed of the K-State wide receiver core, will break some big gains against a defense set to stop the run.

The Hilltoppers return two key players from an offense that averaged 32.8 points and 394.5 yards a game last year. Junior running back Leron Moore (114.6 yards rushing per game) and sophomore quarterback Justin Haddix (1,875 yards passing, 13 touchdowns and a 50.7 completion percentage) are back, but Western Kentucky loses six starters from 2003, including its two leading receivers. They will run and run often after averaging 242.7 yards on the ground last year. If K-State controls the line of scrimmage, and it should, the Wildcat defense will have little problem stopping the Hilltoppers.

DEFENSE

Perennially one of the best units in the country, the K-State defense faces the challenge of replacing seven starters. The unit, which held opponents to 16.3 points a game last year, is by no means short on experience. With senior defensive tackle Jermaine Berry, junior linebacker Ted Sims, junior safety Jesse Tetuan and senior cornerback Cedrick Williams, this group has the potential to be just as strong in 2004.

The Hilltopper defense yielded opponents only 16.8 points and 283.7 yards a game last season and finished ranked sixth in Division I-AA. However, only four starters return from the 2003 squad. Linebackers Charles Thompson and Brandon Smith, both Preseason All-Gateway Conference selections, will lead the unit this year. The Hilltopper defense will use a three-four set with as many players as possible in the box to stop Sproles.

SPECIAL TEAMS

Coach Bill Snyder's teams are always strong on special teams, and this season will be no different. The Wildcat's feature senior kicker Joe Rheem who made 12 field goals on 17 attempts in 2003. Punting for the Wildcats is newcomer junior Jesse Martinez, who averaged 38.3 yards a punt for Santa Rosa Junior College. The return unit will be electric once again with Sproles, who, along with sophomore Jermaine Moreira, helped the Wildcats average 22 return yards on kickoffs and 11 yards on punts. Also in the mix will be Yamon Figue.

Western Kentucky's special teams unit features punter Brian Claybourn, another Preseason All-Gateway Conference player. Last year, Claybourn averaged 41.2 yards a punt. The Hilltoppers have a new kicker this season in freshman Tanner Stewart. In 2003, they averaged 24.6 and 13.1 yards on kickoff and punt returns, respectively, while holding opponents returns on kickoffs to 20.5 yards and 7.5 yards on punts. Western Kentucky has the advantage at punter, but they have an inexperienced kicker and don't come close to the skills of K-State's return unit.

PREDICTION: K-STATE 45- W. KENTUCKY 13

K-State has the advantage on offense, defense and special teams, which will lead them to the win. The Wildcats will probably start out a little slow and then put the game away in the second quarter. Look for the Hilltoppers to score most or all of their points in the second half against K-State's second and third-teamers.

Turning up the heat on coaches

In college football, the hot seat is generally not a place coaches like to be. The glare of the spotlight, the constant criticism and the pressure of an entire state breathing down your neck are enough to make even the toughest-skinned coach crack and curl up into the fetal position, asking for their mommy.

Several Big 12 Conference coaches, whether they admit it, are in the proverbial seat, and with the season kicking off Saturday, the heat will be turned up, and the sweat will begin to flow.

So, for your reading enjoyment, I have compiled a list of those coaches who could fry (electric chair) at any moment, those who could be singed (barbecue grill), and those who are getting warm under the collar (hot plate).

ELECTRIC CHAIR: Gary Barnett, Colorado, and Bill Callahan, Nebraska

It's no secret Barnett has the straps cinched around his wrists after the offseason he and his Buffaloes experienced. Thanks to a recruiting sex/rape scandal, a losing record in 2003 and some not-so-nice statements about a former female kicker, Barnett is lucky to even have a job this season.

Barnett, of course, would like to put everything behind him and just worry about football, but for the rest of the season he will be grilled about his recruiting practices. He also will be watched closely by his superiors at Colorado, and the NCAA to make sure he keeps his team in line.

If not — well, let's just say I'm glad I'm not the one who has to clean up the mess.

Callahan's situation is a little different. The Nebraska Cornhuskers finished 10-3, which included an Alamo Bowl victory over Michigan State.

Former coach Frank Solich led the team to nine wins and a bowl game and then was rewarded for his efforts with a pink slip.

Talk about pressure. Callahan is not only the new guy in town, but he also is bringing in a completely new West Coast offense and will have to produce with players who were originally brought to Nebraska to run the option.

As the Cornhusker faithful have shown, he may only get one shot at being Big Red's head man.

BARBECUE: Mack Brown, Texas, and Gary Pinkel, Missouri

For the time being, Brown is sitting pretty with his Texas Longhorns ranked No. 8 in the Associated Press poll, but his season all comes down to Oct. 9 at the Cotton Bowl in Dallas, Texas.

Although expectations are always high in Austin, and Brown holds a .766 career winning percentage at Texas, he could make the jump from the grill to the chair if he can't beat the hated Oklahoma Sooners, who have demolished the Longhorns by double digits the past four years. Two words, Mack: Beat OU.

Missouri is another Big 12 football program where the expectations are running high. The Tigers are coming off an 8-5 record in 2003, including an Independence Bowl loss to Arkansas, but have been picked by several writers to win the Big 12 North.

Although the Tigers have a talented quarterback in Brad Smith, Missouri only returns 13 starters from a year ago, most on defense. A defense which finished fifth in the Big 12 last season, giving up close to 400 yards per game.

Even Pinkel said he wasn't sure where the hype is coming from, considering the Tigers couldn't win two games in a row during the conference schedule.

"It's kind of hard for me to understand," Pinkel said in Monday's coaches teleconference. "To be in any way over confident to me is mind boggling."

Wildcats' air forces balance offense

Speed and depth at receiver will take pressure off Sproles, force opposing defenses to adjust

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Defenses looking to crowd the line of scrimmage against K-State this season may be in trouble with the speed and depth of the Wildcat wide receivers.

"We are not naive to the fact that people are going to try and load the box and try to take Darren (Sproles) away from us, but I think that is kind of dangerous because of the receivers we have," co-offensive coordinator Del Miller said.

Although the depth chart has sophomores Jermaine Moreira, Yamon Figs and junior Davin Dennis listed as the starters for the Sept. 4 game against Western Kentucky, Coach Bill Snyder said the depth chart will be ever-changing.

"We have balanced ability at the position," he said. "They are all close enough that it could be interchangeable."

Miller said seniors Joe Lawson, Antoine Polite and Tony Madison also will see time for the Wildcats.

"We are probably going to play four or five wide receivers throughout the game," Miller said.

Dennis will be the most experienced starter for the Wildcats, having played in 26 games.

During his sophomore season in 2003, Dennis caught 22 passes for 424 yards and four touchdowns. His biggest game came against the Ohio State Buckeyes in the 2004 Fiesta Bowl, when he caught seven passes for 113 yards and one touchdown.

"He's Mr. Reliable," Figs said. "He's got the hands that stick."

Moreira, who is only one of three true freshman receivers in the Snyder era, saw action as both a return specialist and wideout in 2003.

Miller said Moreira has been a solid receiver for K-State.

"He really runs great routes and has a knack to get open and can certainly catch the ball," Miller said.

At K-State's Media Day in August, Moreira said he has settled in but knows the competition is there.

"I feel way more comfortable, and I have learned a lot more, but you never know because we have a good rotation," he said. "Everybody is right there."

Figs is the fastest of the starters, clocking in at 4.29 seconds in the 40 yard dash, and has made an impression on Snyder with his work ethic.

"He has really made some tremendous strides," Snyder said. "He works extremely hard."

Sophomore quarterback Dylan Meier said Figs can make things happen for the Wildcats.

"He's got that God-given speed, and speed kills," Meier said. "We've really come together and gotten on the same page with the routes, and our timing has really come together."

Western Kentucky comes in confident

By Anthony Mendoza
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The last time Western Kentucky came to town, it wasn't pretty.

In 2002, the Hilltoppers were crowned Division I-AA National Champions. Earlier that same season, they lost at KSU Stadium, and lost 48-3.

Last year, the Hilltoppers finished third in the Gateway Conference and lost in the quarterfinals of the playoffs.

They lost five key starters on offense, including three starting offensive linemen, both starting wide receivers and inside linebacker and leading tackler Eric Dandy.

However, they don't consider themselves huge underdogs going into Saturday's game with nationally ranked K-State.

"I think we got a real good chance, because we've got some good players," said quarterback Justin Haddix, Gateway Conference Freshman of the Year and All-Newcomer Team last season, said. "It's never our goal to go in and lose. We'll play our game, and whatever happens, happens."

Haddix threw for nearly 1,900 yards and 113 touchdowns, averaging 144 yards passing per game in his first season.

The Hilltoppers' game plan is to pound junior running back Leron Moore up the middle. Last year, Moore carried the ball 273 times in 13 games, finishing with 1,490 yards and 13 touchdowns. He earned a spot on the All-Newcomer Team.

"I think we got a real good chance because we've got some good players."

Justin Haddix
WESTERN KENTUCKY QUARTERBACK

Moore said the key to Western Kentucky winning is controlling the ball and limiting turnovers.

"You can't have any mistakes in a game like this, because K-State will capitalize on it," he said.

"We're going to try to keep them off balance and establish the run," Coach David Elson said. "The more time we can possess the football, it will be to our advantage. We're going to need to control the ball and the clock."

On defense, the Hilltoppers held their opponents to about 283 yards of total offense per game and allowed 132 yards per game on the ground.

Last season, Darren Sproles averaged 111 yards per game on the ground against non-conference opponents and 135 yards on 19 carries and a touchdown the last time the two teams hooked up.

"We're going to have to get around the football and gang tackle," Elson said. "We're going to get everyone to him and pursue him, because the play isn't dead until he is down and the whistle blows."

Offensive line ready after roster mix

3 starters return to do battle up front for the Wildcats

By Michael Ashford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Hog-Mollies, road-graters, the guys in the trenches — call them what you will, but the players on K-State's offensive line know that the Wildcat offense starts with them.

"There's always responsibility on the offensive line," Jeromey Clary said. "(Emmitt Smith) had the best offensive line there was, and he destroyed people."

Clary, a junior right tackle, is one of three returning starters on the offensive line for the Wildcats.

They form the nucleus that the rest of the offensive line will build around this season.

K-State will look to some new faces to fill out the two guard spots left by the sudden departures of Travis Triplett and Chris Boggas.

While Triplett's status on the team was in limbo since the start of fall practice, Boggas had been projected as a starter at right guard.

Johnson said the loss of Boggas was particularly surprising.

"When Chris just kind of decided to not show up one day, that was a pretty big shock," Johnson said.

Going into Saturday's game against Western Kentucky, junior Michael Weiner is listed as the starter at the right guard spot, and senior Malcolm Wooldridge is slated to start at left guard.

Coach Bill Snyder said he is pleased with the way his offensive linemen have responded to the loss of Triplett and Boggas.

"I don't have any reservations about where anybody is on the depth chart at this time," Snyder said. "The guys that are up there now, in lieu of (Boggas and Triplett), were there anyway, and when I say 'there anyway,' I mean they weren't scout squad guys."

"They were with us working on the offense."

While the starters have been named, Snyder said the play of John Hafferty at guard and Gerard Spexarth at tackle has been impressive in fall drills.

The freshmen have earned spots on the depth chart as backups, something rarely seen in Snyder's program.

"They've practiced well," Snyder said of Hafferty and Spexarth.

"They were in that mix from the very beginning, and the real issue is learning the offense and making sure that you're going to the right place at the right time," he said.

Co-offensive coordinator Greg Peterson said he is impressed with the development of

Even though Miller said Figs needs to work on his routes and lacks experience, he has been pleased with Figs' progress.

"He has tremendous speed and is very fluid and catches the ball well," Miller said. "His route discipline has to improve a little bit, but we like the direction he is going, and we think he can be a pretty big weapon for us."

Figs said his speed is not something he thinks about.

"It just comes to me," Figs said. "I'm an athlete, so I use my speed to make plays. But other than that, I just listen to my coaches and do what they tell me to do and run the routes, and I'll be open."

Meier said having too many wide receivers isn't a problem for him.

"There's a whole group of them, and they are still fighting for positions on this team," Meier said.

"If we could get them all on the field, we would, but they are a great, great bunch of players. I feel fortunate to get to throw the ball to those guys," he said.

but those are something that I think are on the side," Berry said.

"If we win and the team does our job, then those awards will come," he said.

Entering last year, senior tight end Brian Casey was third on the depth chart.

After given the chance to start because of injuries, Casey had a spectacular season, hauling in 19 receptions for 349 yards and two touchdowns.

Casey's performance did not go unnoticed as the Mackey Award, handed to the nation's top tight end, has added him to their watch list.

Casey said he appreciates the recognition of the hard work he has done.

"It means a lot to me personally, just for the fact that I came from third on the depth chart last year," he said. "Hopefully I can show it out on the field that I deserve that recognition."

Kicker Joe Rheem has also been named to the Lou Groza Award watch list, given to the nation's best kicker.

Rheem's older brother, Jamie, was a two-time finalist for the award when he played at K-State from 1996-2000.

Use of instant replay intrigues coaches

By Josh Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

From the identification of a player's number who commits a penalty, to the ability of head coaches to call timeouts from the sidelines, the NCAA changed several rules this season.

One of the most highly debated changes occurred in the Big 10 Conference, where instant replay will be used in conference games and non-league contests with the opposing team's approval.

In Monday's Big 12 teleconference, several coaches expressed interest in seeing instant replay used in the Big 12 and throughout Division-I football.

"I'd love to see it, because you can have a game determined by a coach or player error," Texas coach Mack Brown said. "But to have a game determined by an error by officials that could be corrected by instant replay is unfair."

Texas A&M coach Dennis Franchione shared a positive view of instant replay, saying conference coaches would likely discuss it in the future.

"From what I've heard about the Big 10 experiment, I like it," he said. "We'll get all the feedback, both pro and con, and then talk about it at our meetings in January."

Colorado coach Gary Barnett said bringing instant replay to the Big 12 and the NCAA comes down to cost. "I think it's a money issue throughout the country," he said.

Iowa State coach Dan McCarney is one Big 12 coach who is not thrilled about instant replay.

McCarney declined the use of instant replay for the Cyclones' Sept. 11 game at Iowa.

"Number one, coaches don't get to challenge any calls that are made," McCarney said. "And, honestly, there is a Big 10 observer who is going to have the final say."

Game length was also a concern for McCarney.

"When you start getting into challenges and appeals on plays, how much longer are games going to go? But it is something I'm willing to listen to," he said.

GIRARD | Coaches face pressure

HOT PLATE: Mark Mangino, Kansas, and Dennis Franchione, Texas A&M.

Mangino led the Jayhawks to its first bowl game in like a century last season and probably sweats profusely just tying his shoes, but the temperature in Memorial Stadium has been turned up a notch after a 6-win season.

Kansas will give Mangino a chance in Lawrence, since the team is only returning three starters, but the big man will have to try to tame K-State if he wants to keep his job.

The last time the Aggies made it to a bowl game was 2001, and they were not even close in 2003, winning only four games under first year coach Franchione.

The Aggies have not beat Texas in four years, and Franchione may only get two or three more chances to end the drought.

cancer this spring.

Never known for being comfortable with speaking to the media, Sproles commented to very few about his ordeal. During Tuesday's press conference, Snyder requested reporters respect Sproles' situation and reserved personality.

Although Sproles is not the most vocal leader on the field, his teammates elected him as captain for the 2004 season.

Snyder said he leads by example and isn't worried about how many times he touches the ball during a game.

"He could care less if he gets 100 yards, but if he can help our football team more by handling the ball, that's what he wants to do," Snyder said. "He wants to go all the time, so there are not particular limitations on him."

Fallujah suicide bombing kills 7 Marines, 3 Iraqi guards

Explosion marks deadliest blow to American forces in 4 months

By Jim Krane
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — An apparent suicide bomber detonated an explosives-packed vehicle

Monday on the outskirts of Fallujah, killing seven U.S. Marines and three Iraqi national guardsmen, the U.S. military said. It was the deadliest day for U.S. forces in four months of fighting.

In Baghdad, meanwhile, an Interior Ministry spokesman said medical tests on a man being held in custody showed he is not former president Saddam Hussein's deputy, Izzat Ibrahim al-Douri, ending conflicting claims about his purported arrest.

The man is a relative of al-Douri, said Interior Ministry spokesman Sabah Kadhim, and was wanted by authorities, but not an important member of Saddam's ousted regime.

The suicide bombing nine miles north of Fallujah — a stronghold for Sunni insurgents — destroyed two Humvees, witnesses said. Medical teams in helicopters swept into the dusty, barren site to ferry away the injured, and troops sealed off the surrounding wreckage.

The force of the car bomb sent the vehicle's engine "a good distance" from the site, a military official said on condition of anonymity.

The Marines killed were members of the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force, which is charged with securing the western Anbar province, an area rife with guerrillas. Names of the dead U.S. and Iraqi troops were withheld pending family notification.

Four Iraqis were wounded by fire from U.S. troops near the site of the bombing, said Ahmed Bassem of the Fallujah General Hospital. The U.S. military was unable to immediately confirm the report.

With Monday's deaths and those of two U.S. soldiers in a mortar barrage outside Baghdad a day earlier, 985 U.S. service members have died since the

KSU police investigate credit scam

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Police Department is investigating a credit scam for a K-State Visa card.

"It was brought to my attention by a student who received a suspicious phone call, and she mistakenly gave her information to the person," Detective Don Stubbings said. "She trusted the person, and they were from K-State Visa cards."

The student gave her social security number, birth date and other personal information. However, Stubbings said, no such credit card exists.

"The university offers cards, and there are cards that are Powercat related, but there wouldn't be anyone soliciting by phone for K-State Visa cards."

The scam also has been making its way around Pittsburg State University. Detectives have not pinpointed a specific person making the calls, but Stubbings said they believe it's from an outside company.

Students can protect themselves with common sense, Stubbings said.

"They should not give any personal information, not just in Visa card scams, but with anything," he said. "Use common sense when it comes to giving out your personal information. If they do receive this phone call, give us a call, and we add that to our investigation."

Another way to find out if a company is legitimate, is to ask for written information, he said.

"The students can ask for written correspondence, and that would help them," Stubbings said. "If they don't have written correspondence, then I wouldn't give information at all."

Kerry renews attacks on Bush

By Darlene Superville
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

RACINE, W.Va. — Democrat John Kerry, with fresh campaign advice from the Comeback Kid, hammered President Bush anew Monday on the economy and Iraq, determined to snap the GOP momentum.

"The 'W' stands for wrong," Kerry said of Bush's middle initial. "Wrong choices, wrong judgment, wrong priorities, wrong direction for our country."

Kerry spoke with a hospitalized former President Clinton during the weekend in a lengthy phone call about reinvigorating his campaign with attacks on Bush's record.

Students enjoy outdoor activities during final days of summer

By Scott Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ten minutes into their holiday fishing outing, Adrienne Williams and Shawn Simmons already had a fish on the line.

As the fish flopped about, trying to escape from the hook lodged in its jaw, Simmons retrieved his pliers from the toolbox beside him and removed the hook from the fish's mouth.

Simmons said the holiday weekend, combined with the beautiful weather, made the fishing spot more crowded than usual.

"Normally, you only see about 10 or so people out here," he said.

In fact, dozens of people were scattered about the shores of Rocky Ford, taking advantage of the day off.

Williams, a junior in business, and Simmons, a senior in kinesiology, were among numerous students and others enjoying the holiday weekend at one of the area's many relaxing outdoor environments

Sunny skies, mild temperatures and serene surroundings greeted visitors to the Rocky Ford Fishing Area on Monday, a place Simmons and Williams know well.

"We come out here every two weeks or so," Simmons said. "Pretty much we're just taking 'er easy. It's a break from homework."

Were he not enjoying his Labor Day fishing, Simmons said he would most likely be working at the Roy Yi, graduate student in biochemistry, empties his net of minnows into a container after catching them Monday afternoon at Rocky Ford Fishing Area. Yi was catching minnows to use as bait before going out to Tuttle Creek Lake.

Whether at work or working at home, he said he was just happy to be able to take it easy.

"Mostly we just come out here to relax," Simmons said.

Williams said the Labor Day holiday provided a nice opportunity to unwind from the hectic school year.

"I just love the environment out here," she said. "I just like to sit back and enjoy it."

Williams and Simmons were not the only people enjoying the Labor Day weekend at Rocky Ford. Roy Yi, graduate student in biochemistry, and his daughter spent the afternoon at the fishing area, searching for minnows below the scenic waterfall.

"We're fishing for minnows to use for bait and then going to Tuttle Creek," Yi said.

Yi said the area provides escape for him and his daughter.

"We usually try to get out and do something, whether it's here or Tuttle or Milford," Williams said. "It's typically one of the last nice weekends to get out to the lake."

READERS' ADVOCATE FOR THE COLLEGIAN

As I pass through the different academic halls on campus,
I see a lot of students, reading and glancing through the pages of our newspaper. As the readers' advocate, it has made me very proud to see the renewed interest in the Collegian, especially after last spring's problems.

Some of you had concerns about the content of the Collegian. Some students want the Collegian to bring back the Campus Forum on Fridays, because Fridays are usually sort of a dead day and they need something interesting to read. I was happy to hear that you were glad to see a little more diversity in the paper, especially on the opinion page.

A few of you suggested that the Collegian has lost its boldness, and that it is too afraid of offending certain groups on campus, so it has become too

"soft" of a paper.

CHRIS BLUIETT

Chris can be reached at cab66676@ksu.edu.

I also have received comments on how the Collegian should try to hire more writers and columnists of diverse backgrounds, so readers can get the opinions of the whole student body, not just a select few.

I realize that the Collegian has a long way to go in regaining the readers' loyalty it lost in the past, but I'm encouraged when I listen to your responses and opinions that you want the Collegian to be your newspaper of choice.
You want the Collegian to be a source of pride.

Thanks again for your feedback, everyone, and please feel free to continue to submit your comments and opinions to me.

the key to your safety deposit box at your bank.

2. In your mailbox you'll find:
A. letters from your parents
B. the latest issue of your favorite magazine
C. several checking account overdraft notices from your bank

3. Your goal in life is to:
A. start a family and buy a nice house in the suburbs
B. have a good-paying job that you enjoy

B. pay your rent and bills and go out on the weekend
C. conveniently "forget" about your rent and bills and "treat" yourself to a $2,000 shopping spree at Abercrombie and Fitch. That should last you for another week or so.

If you answered mostly A, you're frugal, and your money goes a long way.
You usually make wise financial decisions.

If you answered mostly B, you're financially responsible but still like to have fun every once in a while.

Hobby Lobby, Hastings stores moving at month's end

Increase in employees aids business' relocation process

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Hobby Lobby and Hastings will move next to Staples this month.

Scott Nelson, assistant vice president of real estate for Hobby Lobby, said the store will open on Sept. 27.

The store will occupy about 55,000 square feet.

The company has been looking at the Manhattan area for a long time.

"We are interested in being in all of the major markets in Kansas, and Manhattan is one of those," he said. "We like being in cities with large universities."

Lyle Butler, president of the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce, said he is looking forward to seeing Hobby Lobby.

"We have seen a lot of people travel to Topeka and other places to go to Hobby Lobby," he said.

Hastings also will move next to Staples on Sept. 17.

Bary Bedford, store leader, said the store will be closed Sept. 12-Sept. 16 so they can move in.

"Those who have movies due while we are closed will not accrue any late charges as long as they bring them back on the 17th," he said. "The $1 rental credit will be given, too."

Bedford said Hastings staff has increased by about 30 percent to prepare for the move.

The new store will be about 10,000 square feet. Bedford said the increased size will help them go from just under 34,000 book titles to 100,000.

"We are also including used books, and we will start to buy back used books," he said.

Customers also will be able to bring their laptops and hook up to high speed internet service at the Hard Back Cafe.

"This will be a fully staffed department," Bedford said. "We will be one of the first stores to have it."

The official grand opening for Hastings is Oct. 8.

Bedford said there have been some inquiries about the space Hastings will be leaving.

"We are going to try to sublease it," he said.

The building that once housed Wal-Mart is now being renovated in order to bring in a Hobby Lobby craft store and Hastings Entertainment Inc. book store.

Federal government awards K-State $700,000 ESL grant

By Joanna Rubick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The U.S. Department of Education awarded more than $700,000 to K-State to help train Kansas teachers.

The No Child Left Behind grant will be used for Project Critically Advancing Results from Educators to train teachers in Emporia, Kan., in how to teach students who speak little English.

Socorro Herrera, associate professor in elementary education, said Emporia has a need for this type of training.

"It's wonderful when we get to work with teachers. For those of us in education, that's a fantastic opportunity."

Socorro Herrera
ASSOCIATE PROFESSOR, ELEMENTARY EDUCATION

"We want to train teachers on how to communicate with students that speak English as a second language," she said. "Emporia has an incredibly high number of students."

Project CARE will span more than five years, Herrera said. The first year 200 elementary and middle school educators will work toward achieving an English as a Second Language endorsement, Herrera said.

Susan Donnelly, program manager, said the goals of the program are to get the endorsement, teach the educators Sheltered Instruction Observation

Protocol, a lesson planning format, and to train them to work with the family of the student.

"We want to see parents become more active in their children's schoolwork," she said.

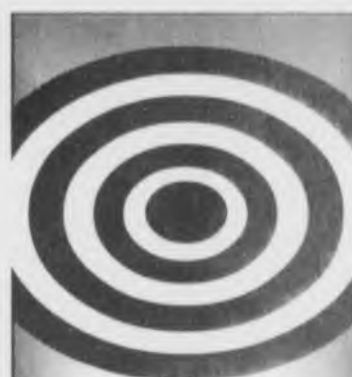

The need for ESL-endorsed teachers in Kansas has risen drastically in recent years, Donnelly said. In the last 10 years, Kansas has experienced a 325 percent rise in ESL enrollment, she said.

"Donnelly agreed with Herrera that Emporia is a good place to begin Project Care. They have a very large amount of culturally and linguistically diverse students," she said.

Herrera said she is ready to get started on the project, which begins soon.

"This is a really exciting opportunity," she said. "It's wonderful when we get to work with teachers. For those of us in education, that's a fantastic opportunity."

IN THEATERS SEPTEMBER 10

TO THE POINT Take advantage of arts activities around town

Art can enhance a community, and Manhattan has numerous opportunities for individuals to enjoy all aspects of the arts.

One could check out the several local and national artists who exhibit their work in the several local and campus venues. These artists delve into all sorts of media, including ceramics, paints of all sorts and techniques, drawings and photography, just to name a few.

There are classes, both on and off campus, that focus on a variety of media and are available for students of any age. K-State's art and theater programs support the community, and vice versa, while spectators and fans reap the benefits.

The thriving theater program is nationally recognized, and that is partly because of the number of student-based projects. This nurtures the students' talents and enriches the community. Opportunities for students equate to opportunities for the community.

Manhattan's music scene is thriving with support of local bands uniting together, as well as the community as a whole. There are a number of venues offering a place for bands to play.

K-State students and Manhattan residents should embrace this thriving art community, and, in turn, be exposed to local culture.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Academic encroachment

Giving course credit for athletics is disturbing for some

It appears that lately Bill Snyder has been dreaming of leaving his raucous career as a football coach for the more sedate life of an academic.

He's even been teaching his own course, Varsity Football.

For those who want to know, it's ATHM 104 in your coursebook and, no, you can't get those four credit hours unless you're a football major.

Of course, if the Washington Post is right, Bill isn't ever going to earn the prestige of a full-fledged professor. Real professors don't give 92 percent of their class A's every semester, and they don't bail students out of jail, either.

And every tenured professor knows, you can't have a real class that, Athletic Director Tim Weiser said, has "no required syllabus, mid-term, or final examination."

Real professors will have all three, and they'll make you buy the syllabus and bring your own damn bluebook to take the test.

But hey, if we're going to allow courses in football, why don't we just go ahead and include football as a department in the College of Arts and Sciences?

After all, according to the Washington Post, Bill Snyder already makes more than the entire faculty of the political science department combined. He's already practically a department unto himself.

And the athletic department probably already gives out more free tutoring and "scholarship" money than anyone else on campus.

But just think, if we could stop pretending that we actually care about academics, we could offer a whole range of football courses and keep athletes out of classes they don't want to be in in the first place.

Rather than physics or English, they could take "Tackling for Beginners" or "What 'No' Means." However, before the football department could take its rightful place at the department head meetings, Bill Snyder is going to have to make a few changes.

According to the NCAA, only about 3 percent of collegiate athletes who make it to their senior year will play even one year of professional sports. Compared to the 66 percent placement rates of K-State graduates in other areas, these are dismal numbers.

Can you imagine if only 3 percent of architectural engineering students spent more than a year actually practicing architectural engineering?

But again, with an enlarged football curriculum, this is something we can certainly improve.

Or maybe we should just forget trying to mix oil and water and get rid of the athletic department altogether.

Who are we kidding? Since when is football an academic subject?

Why do we allow the athletic department to be placed on par with other areas of the university?

Allowing exceptions for athletes and elevating them above other students is not only antithetical to the university's purpose, but dangerous as well.

According to the National Coalition Against Violent Athletes, one in three sexual assaults committed at colleges are perpetrated by student athletes, who are also four times more likely to be charged with assault than the rest of the population.

When we allow athletic programs to become the most important thing, athletes can endanger the very people university is supposedly here for: students who want to learn.

All of the alumni donations and Heisman trophies in the world should never outweigh our university's dedication to academics and its commitment to protect students, even if that means losing star players and losing the game.

Allowing football players to get graded course credit for playing undermines the efforts of students who actually work hard for their GPAs, and it also undermines attempts by the NCAA to ensure that collegiate athletes are students first.

We shouldn't put up with a university that cheapens our degrees by selling out its academic integrity.

Social Security program needs reform

Members of my generation, it is time that we wake up and realize that we are in a fight that is literally to the death.

In this battle, we fight our parents and grandparents, over Social Security.

While I hate to admit it, I, as well as you, will be old one day. And without Social Security, more than 50 percent of elderly Americans would be in poverty.

Our own economic future is at risk, as well as the financial solvency of our nation and its economy.

As Alan Greenspan, the single most important person to the U.S. economy, put it, "If we delay, the adjustment could be abrupt and painful."

To win this war I feel it is necessary to do what the old people do. No, not die. . . VOTE!

This coming election year, Social Security reform should be paramount. The Congressional Budget Office estimates that if no reform is implemented, Social Security will become bankrupt by 2019, leaving our generation with an extraordinarily high price.

Social Security has two fundamental problems that will push it into bankruptcy.

People are living longer, and the baby boomers will soon require more money paid out to retirees than will be collected by Social Security taxes.

In order to make up the difference and keep the benefits flowing, we either will have to raise taxes, take the money from other programs or cut benefits.

In order to raise taxes enough to save Social Security, we would have to raise taxes to such a high level that the taxes would stifle our economy, including jobs.

So that leaves either cutting benefits or taking money from other programs, both bad options.

I do not know what the best way to solve this problem is, but the sooner we act, the less it will hurt to fix it.

According to the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, plans on the table to fix Social Security will cost up to $68 trillion. But if we delay any longer, the trillions will only keep adding up.

The cost, while large, is not the real prohibitive factor in our quest to fix Social Security to help save our future. The real dilemma is grandpa and grandpa.

Social Security often is called the third rail of politics, in reference to the third rail in a subway system. No one can touch the third rail without being electrocuted.

Arguably the most influential lobbyist group in the nation, the American Association of Retired Persons, or AARP, is firmly set against Social Security changes that would see benefits reduced.

And why is the AARP so powerful? Old people vote.

This coming election year, keep in mind what the candidates' plans are for Social Security.

President Bush claims he will help Social Security by using personal investment accounts. As for Sen. Kerry, he has only to oppose Bush's plan, and not actually float one of his own.

But until some one actually follows through on a campaign promise (I know it might be a while), I suggest we form our own group, the American Association of Partying Persons (AAPP).

Here is the plan—we will party every night, playing a continuous track of "Louie Louie," drinking, dancing, and otherwise making a large, loud public disturbance.

The more we annoy the old timers, the more likely we will be to have our demand for Social Security reform met.

And in case the AAPP fails, we may have to resort back to my initial plan. Think of it as doing it like they do on the History Channel and vote.

Ice cream social a success thanks to community's support

Editor,

The Kansas Children's Service League would like to send a thank you to the K-State community for supporting our Kansas Children's Service League's Ice Cream Social on Sunday, Aug. 22. The event was an overwhelming success.

Numerous teams and businesses participated, and more than 1,100 individuals attended the event. This success helped us to achieve our goal - to create an event that children and families could enjoy while giving them the opportunity to learn more about the Kansas Children's Service League's services and programs.

We attribute the success of the event to the tremendous support of the K-State community. We couldn't have done it without you.

We are also so appreciative of the event's major sponsors, team sponsors, entertainers, volunteers, Hiland Dairy and the Sunset Zoo. We extend a special note of thanks to the players from the K-State football, men's basketball, and women's basketball teams who came out, signed autographs and made the evening that much more memorable for so many of your fans.

Thanks again K-State! We look forward to seeing you again next year!

Netters get 2 wins in Houston

By Kent Hildebrand
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The women's volleyball team had a busy weekend at the Houston Invitational with wins against Maryland and Houston and a loss to California.

The 15th-ranked Wildcats are now 3-1 on the season.

Coach Suzie Fritz said she saw positives and negatives from her team in the three games.

"There was some great and some not so great things," she said. "We're still playing too inconsistently. We're not stringing good plays over time, stringing our success, so right now that's where we're struggling."

"I think the good things are that our ball control has been pretty good, and offensively we were solid. There's still a lot of things that we have to get better at."

On Friday, the Cats defeated Maryland in three straight sets, 30-28, 30-20, 30-25. Senior outside hitter Valeria Hejjas led the team with 21 kills while hitting .529.

In its second match, K-State was swept by California, 21-30, 29-31, 23-30.

Seniors Hejjas and setter Gabby Guerre were bright spots for K-State, with Hejjas landing 12 kills on .400 hitting, while Guerre turned in a double-double with 10 kills and 31 assists.

"Friday was tough, because Maryland and Cal both are very good volleyball teams," Fritz said. "I think that we were happy that we went ahead and played that match against Oral Roberts on Tuesday, because we got that first game out of the way. That was Maryland's first game, and I think we were a little more prepared in terms of what to expect, so in the first match we saw some very positive things."

"In the second match, Cal ran an incredibly fast left-side set at us, and we spent most of the night trying to catch up with it."

On Saturday, to conclude the tournament, K-State held off host-school Houston to win in five games, 30-22, 25-30, 24-30, 30-25, 15-10. After dropping two of the first three games, the Wildcats battled back, taking games four and five to win the match.

Again, it was Guerre and Hejjas leading the way. Each had double-doubles, Guerre with 59 assists and 10 kills and Hejjas with 18 kills and 12 digs.

Three other Wildcats also had 10 or more kills. Senior middle blocker Lisa Martin finished a good weekend with 16 kills and eight blocks and freshman libero Angie Lastra added 17 digs.

"Saturday afternoon, after playing two matches and then having to come back less than probably 15 hours later, it's tough, and it's fatiguing, and I thought we handled it well," Fritz said.

"We got in a five-game battle with Houston, and in the end I felt great about the composure we had late in the match and the execution."

Fritz said the play of Hejjas was especially encouraging after she struggled last Wednesday against Oral Roberts.

"(Her play) was important probably more psychologically than physically," Fritz said. "We know that she's capable of doing tremendous things. We've added a little more responsibility to her outside role, and generally when you do that a player's attacking suffers. The good thing is that her's only suffered for one game, and she was really, really good this weekend."

Monday, Hejjas was named Big 12 Player of the Week for her offensive performance.

Hejjas said her improved play was a result of better focus.

"I don't think I was mentally ready for playing against Oral Roberts," she said. "I just had to organize my focus; I wasn't prepared enough mentally."

"(This weekend) I just kept my head and concentrated on everything I do, all the small things. Every touch I wanted to be perfect."

Red-zone offense, secondary, special teams falter during play

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

On paper, K-State dominated Western Kentucky.

But despite nearly doubling the Hilltoppers in total yards and time of possession, the Wildcats never gained a comfortable advantage in their 27-13 win Saturday over the Division I-AA foe.

Coach Bill Snyder said he was less than shocked by the margin of victory due to his team's prior performance in practice.

"Maybe they recognize what my concerns have been all along," he said. "We haven't practiced well enough to do the things I'd like for them to do on Saturday."

Though compiling 27 first downs and 502 totals yards, the K-State offense never opened up a large lead.

In a possession highlighting Wildcat offensive inefficiencies, K-State failed to score a touchdown during the final possession of the first half on first-and-goal from the Western Kentucky 3-yard line.

Several miscues occurred during the series.

On first down, sophomore quarterback Dylan Meier fumbled a center-to-quarterback exchange, followed by senior running back Darren Sproles fumbling and recovering the football the next play.

Then, a false-start penalty on fourth-and-goal from the 1 forced K-State to settle for a field goal to give the Wildcats a slim 10-6 advantage at the half.

The possession was one of three instances when K-State did not score a

Sproles rolls up 221 yards in opener

Western Kentucky got a heavy dose of senior running back Darren Sproles in K-State's season opening 27-13 win Saturday.

In Sproles' first game as a senior, the 5-foot-7 Olathe, Kan., native carried the ball 42 times for 221 yards against the Hilltoppers. His 42 carries were one shy of his personal record of 43 against Missouri in 2003. It also was the fourth time in his last six games Sproles has registered more than 200 yards rushing.

"Darren played fine," Coach Bill Snyder said. "Darren ran well, and sometimes he made some on his own, but a lot of time he had some space to run through."

On the Wildcats' opening 15-play touchdown drive, Sproles touched the ball nine times for 37 yards.

"He wears on you, and he's incredible," Western Kentucky coach David Elson said of Sproles. "His sense of balance and the way he can break tackles, those types of running backs are the toughest to defend, because they have such a low sense of gravity and balance."

Although Sproles averaged 5.3 yards per carry, he said he should have been in the end zone more.

"I didn't score at times when I needed to score," he said.

Sproles' only score came on the Wildcats' first drive of the second half, when he broke through the line and scampered up the left side-line for a 32-yard touchdown. The run put Sproles over the century mark for the 20th time in his career.

"He's a legitimate Heisman Trophy candidate; there's no doubt about that," Elson said. "He's a great, great player, and great players make plays, and he did that tonight."

Sproles said he didn't expect to carry the ball more than 40 times, but when asked if he wanted the ball that many times, he said he'd take it.

Darren Sproles runs for a short gain during the first quarter of Saturday's game. Sproles ran for 227 yards on 42 carries, helping the Wildcats to a 27-13 win over the Hilltoppers.

"Yeah, I do (like to get the ball that much), it gets me into a rhythm," Sproles said. "We won, so it's a good start."

Junior tackle Jeromey Clary said Sproles' performance didn't surprise him.

"He's an amazing back, and he is an amazing athlete," Clary said.

"We have to get him the ball as much as we can. In college football, if you can run it and they can't stop it, we are going to keep pounding it down your throat," he said.

Opening game plagued by problems

ANTHONY MENDOZA

It was ugly.

That's the only way to describe Saturday's 27-13 win over Division I-AA Western Kentucky.

Prior to this bore, the most points given up in a non-conference home opener was the University of Montana scoring 12 points on the Wildcats in 1992.

That's not the only record that K-State surrendered on Saturday.

Lerron Moore's 13-yard touchdown run to cap off a 15-play, 80-yard drive was the first touchdown for the Hilltoppers against a Division I school in four years.

Two years ago, K-State dominated the eventual Division I-AA champion, winning 48-3. This time around, K-State surrendered two touchdowns to the Hilltoppers.

Looking at the final statistics, K-State dominated, racking up 502 yards of offense, including a Heisman-like 42-carry, 221-yard performance by Darren Sproles.

Why was the score so close?

Turnovers in the red-zone, penalties and settling for field goals inside the 10-yard line all led to the low score.

The most glaring problem on offense, though, is that K-State is one-dimensional.

Running Sproles 40 times a game may lead him to individual success, but until they can establish a passing game, the Wildcats will struggle, especially when conference play begins.

In his first game as starter, Dylan Meier was solid at times.

He finished 12-18, throwing for 183 yards, but he also overthrew two receivers in the end zone.

This week, the Wildcats play Fresno State.

Sunday, the Bulldogs did something the Hilltoppers were unable to do against K-

State — they capitalized on their opponent's mistakes.

Fresno State returned two interceptions for touchdowns and a fumble for another in their 35-16 win over Washington on Sunday.

Take into account that in the last three years the Bulldogs' average win total is nine games, and they return 39 out of 44 players from last year's team and the Wildcats have a legit opponent.

One that, if they played like they did on Saturday, will be Marshall University all over again.

CFB | Brothers arrested in tailgating shooting deaths

Two brothers were arrested in the shooting deaths of two young men at a tailgate party before a college football game, authorities said.

Witnesses said a fistfight preceded the shootings Saturday evening.

The victims, identified as Kevin M. McCann, 23, of Chicago, and Marine 2nd Lt. Brett Johnson Harman, 23, of Park Ridge, Ill., were tailgating before North Carolina State University's season-opening football game against Richmond. Neither was a student at the university.

Tony Harrell Johnson, 20, of Raleigh, and his brother, Timothy Wayne Johnson, 22, an NCSU student, were arrested a short time later and charged with two counts of first-degree murder, said sheriff's department spokeswoman Phyllis Stephens.

A witness, Brian Smith, 31, said the victims had been tossing a football when a car drove recklessly in a parking lot packed with football fans. He said the men pulled the blond-haired driver from his car and beat him, pushing his head into the dirt.

The blond man left in his car, shouting curses and threatening revenge, Smith said. He returned later and asked Smith where to find the men who had beaten him, saying he had "a .38 Smith & Wesson for them."

CFB | 2 Bowden relatives die during hurricane

A grandson and a former son-in-law of Florida State football coach Bobby Bowden were killed when their car was hit by a utility truck that was helping to restore power outages caused by Hurricane Frances.

John Allen Madden, a 45-year-old former Florida State lineman who played under Bowden, and his 15-year-old son, Bowden Madden, were killed instantly Sunday when the passenger side of their car hit the front of the truck, Florida Highway Patrol Lt. Robert Mills said Monday.

The driver of the truck, Danny Headley, was not injured.

Moments before the collision on rain-slicked Interstate 10, the Maddens' car bumped a van as the two were traveling side by side, causing both vehicles to cross over the highway median and the van to end up in the woods.

Golf | Singh wins, takes No. 1 spot from Woods

Vijay Singh won a head-to-head matchup with Tiger Woods to end his record reign atop golf's ultimate leaderboard.

Singh shot a 69 to beat Woods and Adam Scott by three strokes in the Deutsche Bank Championship on Monday, clinching the No. 1 ranking in the world with his sixth victory of the year. Woods had been first for more than five years — a record 264 consecutive weeks.

Singh took a three-stroke lead into the final round, but he and Woods were tied at 13 under after Singh bogeyed No. 13 at the par-71, 7,415-yard TPC of Boston. Woods bogeyed the next hole and Singh birdied 15 to pull ahead by two strokes before adding birdies on the final two holes to finish 16 under and win the $900,000 first prize.

Bjork's 'Medulla' blends a cappella

"Medulla"

★★★★☆

Album review by Jessica Grant

Bjork is an artist. She is a genre-bending wonder who has become an icon of avant-garde style.

Whether as a musician or actress, Bjork is an artist in the truest sense of the word: a woman driven by a passion for unique creation and vision.

This also means that she can be extreme.

"Medulla" is the seventh studio album from Iceland's biggest star, and it is easily Bjork's most ambitious piece to date.

Unfortunately, it is the kind of album that will most likely appeal to existing fans only.

Apart from understated keyboards and a bit of sublime computer programming, "Medulla" is largely an a cappella album. Rhythm sections are performed largely by human beatboxes Schlomo, Rahzel (The Roots) and Dokaka.

Bjork also employs veteran U.K. singer-songwriter Robert Wyatt, former Faith No More frontman and current Tomahawk vocalist Mike Patton, and Icelandic and London choirs. The mix is eclectic and something that only Bjork could make work.

Despite the a cappella sound, Bjork also has somehow managed to keep a distinctly electronic edge to many of the tracks, thanks in part to longtime Bjork collaborator Mark "LFO" Bell.

Although this is probably not Bjork's most accessible album, it definitely is her most expressive and ethereal performance.

"Medulla" opens with "The Pleasure is All Mine," a soft wailing track that receives harmonic fullness with assistance from the Icelandic Choir.

"Oceania," a bizarre track with hip-hop beats layered under the sliding voices of the London Choir, was sung by Bjork at the opening of the Athens Olympics. The lyrical imagery is that of a bizarre oceanic journey.

"Mouth's Cradle" is a surreal song that is best heard in surround sound. The symphonic vocals perform a swooping dance around the heavy beat box of Rahzel. Dipping a bit into politics, Bjork sings, "I need a shelter to build an altar away from all Osamas and Bushes."

The final track "Triumph of the Heart" is probably the only radio friendly song on "Medulla." It is an amazing hip hop song that even has a fantastic human trombone sound.

"Vokuro" is one of the most moving songs on "Medulla." Sung in her native Icelandic, "Vokuro" has gentle vocals underscored by the perfectly subtle Icelandic choir.

Rarely do pop artists create something that is as unique as it is amazing. With "Medulla" Bjork has proved her fearlessness and weirdness as a true artist.

Making art accessible

Classes help introduce culture to children, adults

By Jessica Grant
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For members of the Manhattan community, art is becoming more accessible.

The Manhattan Arts Center will be starting its fall art classes for youth and young adults, said Brady Miller, Manhattan Art Center program and marketing director.

"The Manhattan Arts Center is for us to cultivate the arts," Miller said. "We offer classes in acting, arts, and mixed media. For fall, the art classes we offer are really expanded. We have managed to triple the number of classes and instructors."

Miller said the MAC will now be offering more classes focusing on clay and ceramics.

"In December, we got the kilns fixed for ceramics," Miller said. "In January, we began offering ceramics classes. For the fall, we will be offering more clay based classes than ever," Julie Gibbs, graduate student and manager of the MAC west annex, noted the contributions necessary for these classes.

"Yoshi Ikeda and a graduate student spent three days working on the kilns in December. This is a great example of the University and the community working together. Because of their work, the kilns are functioning and we are now able to offer classes in ceramics," said Gibbs.

Miller said the MAC has offered art classes since 1996, but for a while the program had dwindled. He said the MAC is working to offer more classes and have more medium specific classes like clay and painting.

"This summer was the first time we had 30 or 40 classes offered," Miller said. "This summer was fantastic. A lot of art classes are really taking off. Some of the classes offered for the fall are already full. The ceramics class has really taken off. Just getting word of mouth out was great."

"We have clay tools, wheels, and classic kick wheels available for the open studio sessions on Wednesday and Sunday from 6 to 9. We sell the clay, and anyone can come in and work," said Gibbs.

The MAC also is employing K-State professors and faculty members to teach classes, Miller said.

"Most of our instructors are members of the MAC and local galleries," Miller said. "A lot came from faculty or personal recommendations. K-State has outstanding instructors, and the ones who work for us have a bachelors or masters in art. It sets us apart from other communities, because we have the resources of K-State right here."

Dan Heinz, graduate student in theater, is teaching two sessions of a theater class for K-6 grade students.

"K-State's theater program is nationally respected in all areas of theater," Heinz said. "Having that resource available, it makes sense for the MAC to tap into the students."

Heinz, who this summer taught youth theater at Helen Hocker Theater in Topeka, said the MAC program has generated great feedback from the community.

"I've received great feedback from the kids as well as the parents," Heinz said. "My class offers kids a chance to play acting games and learn about theater without undue pressure."

"My kids aren't taught to pander to an audience - I teach them how to perform for themselves, no matter what. I think kids need that sort of freedom. So much of their day is spent learning how to do things 'right.' My class teaches kids to be confident in their own expression," said Heinz.

"I am a very deep believer in art education at an early age. If you teach a child about art, it sparks many interdisciplinary interests. If my students are studying glazing, that can lead into a discussion about chemistry. It's a very user friendly introduction into math, art, science, and history," Gibbs said.

James Taylor, senior in ceramics and painting, said there are several reasons to explore art.

"Art is a key to any culture. In terms of history, art is what is left behind. Students should realize that art is a link to understanding their own culture."

Gibbs also said art helps people to "dynamically take part in community and the environment. They can get a sense of participating in the society that they live in," she said.

The MAC classes are not just for children. Miller said the classes have been a mix of older and younger people.

"The youth make up the majority of the students enrolled, but we're really trying to get the word out to adults," Miller said.

Album portrays Bob Dylan in new light

"Is It Rolling, Bob?"

★★★★☆

Album review by Matt Groneman

Tribute albums rarely pique my interest.

They often are overloaded with hip new superstars, who wore diapers when the tributee last performed, turning in half-hearted performances of someone else's hits.

"Is It Rolling, Bob?," a reggae tribute to Bob Dylan, rises above most tribute albums with strong performances from fairly unknown artists who reinterpret rather than reiterate the songs they tackle.

Most of the obvious choices for reggae artists are ignored. Producer Doctor Dread avoided adding older tracks by Bob Marley or Peter Tosh, as well as reggae forays by Dylan collaborators like Eric Clapton.

Dread commissioned all newly recorded tracks from Jamaican stars such as Toots Hibbert, Drummie Zeb, and Sizzla. Most who buy the album will be introduced to these artists for the first time.

The only track not recorded in 2004 is a reggae remix of Dylan's "I and I," a religious song that featured Jamaican rhythm players Sly Dunbar and Robbie Shakespeare on the original recording; their bass and drum contributions have been turned up on the new mix. This is one of very few remixes sanctioned for release by Dylan.

The first striking thing about this album is the cover. It is a painting that parodies Dylan's 1965 album "Bringing It All Back Home" by filling the original cover with imagery of marijuana, Red Stripe beer, Bob Marley and Jamaica.

The best thing about the album is the way that some covers make the listener hear Dylan's songs in a new way.

Two songs that stand out in this way are "Lay Lady Lay" and "Knocking On Heaven's Door." Despite having written "Lay Lady Lay" for his wife, Dylan's version always sounds like he is trying to woo a one-night stand. The Mighty Diamonds make the song sound as it was intended, a declaration for marriage and of fidelity.

Dylan wrote "Knocking On Heaven's Door" as the lamentation of sheriff Pat Garrett after shooting his old friend Billy the Kid as part of his job. The song asks for no more violence than that which has already been committed.

In Luciano's version, the refrain is sung as "knocking on Zion's door." Zion is the promised land. This making the song indicate heaven can exist on earth and the way to achieve it is to put down the gun before anyone, even Billy the Kid, gets hurt.

This album is far superior to Dylan's live reggae album "At Budokan" but probably won't provide much substance for those who are fans of neither Dylan nor reggae.

A limited edition contains an extra disc of remixes of songs on the album.

Russians mourn for terrorists' victims

By Mike Eckel
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BESLAN, Russia — Russia observed the first national day of mourning for the more than 350 victims of the terrorist school seizure on Monday, while foreign planes delivered medical supplies to this grief-stricken southern region neighboring Chechnya.

In Beslan, townspeople crowded around the coffins of children, parents, grandparents and teachers ahead of the 120 burials scheduled in the town cemetery and adjoining fields.

At the school at the center of the tragedy, people lit candles and left shrines including children's notebooks, shoes, and bottles of water — symbolizing the water the hostages were denied during the three days of terror.

Two rescue workers from Russia's Emergency Situations Ministry who were killed in the first moments of the battle over the school Friday — when they arrived to remove the bodies of executed hostages — were being laid to rest in Ramenskoye, the ministry's base outside Moscow.

Criticism of the government response was mounting, with even Russian state television chiding officials for understating the magnitude of the crisis, for their slowness to admit that previous recent attacks were by terrorists, and for their apparent paralysis.

"At such moments, society needs the truth," Rossiya television commentator Sergei Brilyov said Sunday night.

The criticism, which was almost certainly sanctioned by the Kremlin, stopped short of the president himself.

Brilyov blamed the "system of administration," where "everything hangs on the bravery of the rank and file, but generals can't bring themselves to act until the president throws ideas to them." On Saturday, Putin had criticized Russia's law enforcement agencies for failing to rise to the challenge of terrorism.

On Sunday, weeping mourners placed flowers and wreaths at graves hastily dug by volunteers, including one where two sisters — Alina, 12 and Ira, 13 — were laid to rest together.

Service group claims awards

By Joanna Rubick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State honor students received top awards this summer.

At the Mortar Board national conference in Columbus, Ohio, the K-State Mortar Board, a senior honor society, was awarded the Ruth Weimer Mount Chapter Excellence Award.

The award is given annually to one college in the nation, and it specifically recognizes the contributions of the preceding year's members.

Jan Wissman, adviser, said this was the third year for the award to be offered.

Chapters can win once every five years.

Criteria for the award included campus visibility and strong membership participation, she said.

She said K-State always had a strong organization.

"It's an awesome award," Wissman said. "Definitely that chapter has a lot of tradition to build on."

Victoria Luhrs, Mortar Board president said there are more than 200 chapters nationwide.

Luhrs, senior in secondary education, attended the conference along with Sarah Burdick, service team leader.

At the conference, the chapters were able to share ideas, she said.

"It was surprising to Sarah and I, because we realized how much we could teach other chapters," Luhrs said.

K-State also was one of 35 chapters to receive the Golden Torch Award.

The Golden Torch Award recognized the group for fulfilling and exceeding all necessary requirements.

Additionally, the K-State chapter was one of 60 to receive the Project of Excellence Award, Luhrs said.

"We're always working on different service project awards,"

Luhrs said.

Some of the projects include Reading as Leading, where members read to children on a weekly basis, she said. They also hold a day for high school seniors and an administrative forum.

Clinton undergoes successful heart surgery

Physicians predict full, normal recovery ahead for former U.S. president

By Sam Dolnick
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Bill Clinton underwent a successful quadruple heart bypass operation Monday to relieve severely clogged arteries that had put the former president at high risk of suffering a heart attack.

"He is recovering normally at this point," said Dr. Craig Smith, the surgeon who led the operation. "Right now everything looks straightforward."

Smith said Clinton could leave the hospital in four or five days. Doctors said they expect him to make a full recovery, although the heart disease they repaired was "extensive."

The four-hour surgery came three days after Clinton checked himself into the hospital complaining of chest pain and shortness of breath. Tests soon revealed that blockage in several of Clinton's arteries was "well over 90 percent," Smith said.

"There was a substantial likelihood that he would have had a substantial heart attack" in the near future, said Dr. Allan Schwartz, chief of cardiology at New York Presbyterian Hospital/Columbia.

Schwartz said Clinton was awake but sedated about four hours after the operation ended. He was using a breathing tube and had not spoken yet, he said.

In a statement, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and the couple's daughter, Chelsea, thanked the hospital staff for helping the family through an "emotional roller-coaster."

"The president's optimism and faith will carry him through the difficult weeks and months ahead," the statement said.

In bypass surgery, doctors remove one or more blood vessels from elsewhere in the body and attach them to arteries serving the heart, detouring blood around blockages.

The vessel typically comes from elsewhere in the chest, although doctors sometimes take one from an arm, a leg or the stomach.

"There was nothing in this case that was outside the realm of routine," Smith said.

Schwartz said it would be possible for Clinton in the future to lead an "extraordinarily active lifestyle" — including hitting the campaign trail.

Doctors decided not to operate immediately on Friday because Clinton was on the blood-thinning medication Plavix, and waiting a few days decreased the chance of excessive bleeding, they said.

Clinton was described as upbeat in the days before the surgery, resting with his wife and daughter. One New York Post photo showed the former president reaching for a Boggle game near his hospital-room window.

Clinton has blamed the blockage in part on genetics — there is a history of heart disease in his mother's family — but also said he "may have done some damage in those years when I was too careless about what I ate."

He was lampooned during his presidency for his inability to resist fatty fast food, but he also was an avid jogger during his two terms in the White House.

In recent months he has appeared much slimmer. He has said he cut out junk food, begun working out and adopted the low-carbohydrate, low-fat South Beach diet.

Clinton had planned to campaign for Sen. John Kerry, the Democratic nominee for president, but the recovery from surgery will take him off the stump with just two months left until the election.

From his hospital room before the surgery, Clinton had a long telephone conversation with Kerry on campaign strategy, said a Democratic official familiar with the talk who spoke on condition of anonymity. Some polls have shown Kerry trailing President Bush since the Republican convention last week.

Meanwhile, more than 37,000 get-well wishes poured in for the former president, including tens of thousands of e-mails sent to the Web site of his presidential library.

"You are surrounded by cherished family, friends and a nation that adores you and prays for your full and complete recovery," wrote Toni Maryanna Rossi. "You'll be jogging five miles a day in no time."

Former U.S. President Bill Clinton speaks in June at the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees' 36th International Convention in Anaheim, Calif. Clinton underwent a successful heart bypass operation Monday.

Tropical Storm Frances ravages lives, property

By Allen G. Breed
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

FORT PIERCE, Fla. — Weakened but persistent, Tropical Storm Frances took aim Monday at the Florida Panhandle after the former hurricane caused flooding and ripped roofs off buildings throughout a wide swath of central and southern Florida. About 6 million people lost power, and at least four people were killed.

More than 13 inches of rain fell along Florida's central east coast, flooding some areas four feet deep late Sunday, before Frances entered the Gulf of Mexico. In its wake, boats and mobile homes were mangled, and trees and power lines were toppled.

State officials urged people to stay where they were because of the possibility of flooding and the difficulty of finding service stations still in operation.

"Our message is turn around — don't drown. If you do not have to travel, don't do so today," state meteorologist Ben Nelson said Monday at a news briefing. Lt. Gov. Toni Jennings said officials were working to get fuel to emergency workers and gas stations.

Not everyone heeded the warning, even as rain began falling heavily in the Panhandle. Tamara Suarez decided to open the Cafe Con Leche in the historic fishing and oyster village of Apalachicola because "it's better to be here than at home, just waiting and waiting."

Frances' path crossed some of the area hit by Charley, which killed 27 people and caused an estimated $7.4 billion in insured damage. One risk-assessment company estimated insured losses from Frances could range anywhere from $2 billion to $10 billion, but a state official said it could be on the low end of that range.

"If it's the same all the way across, we're looking at a couple of billion dollars rather than the big numbers we were seeing earlier," state Chief Financial Officer Tom Gallagher, who oversees the insurance industry, said Monday. Experts estimate that total damages are typically about double insured losses.

Parts of downtown Tampa were flooded Monday. In Daytona Beach, one of the hardest-hit cities, roofs were torn off several small hotels and the Peabody Auditorium, where the London Symphony Orchestra appears annually. The sign across the coastal highway proclaiming Daytona "The World's Most Famous Beach" was destroyed. Most of Daytona Beach and about a third of the state's 17 million residents remained without power, officials said at the briefing.

KERRY | Former Clinton staffers assist in campaign as presidential nominees continue nationwide travel

Monday, earned the Comeback Kid moniker in his 1992 campaign after a second-place finish in New Hampshire despite allegations of womanizing. He went on to win the White House, and, time and again, on the verge of political death, managed to survive.

Democrats have fretted over Bush's rise in polls after last week's Republican convention.

The Kerry-John Edwards ticket got some unsolicited advice from supporters in Wisconsin.

"You have to speak up — they're going to run you right over and make you look like idiots," Katie Simenson, 41, told Edwards at a campaign event in Oak Creek, Wis.

Edwards reassured the supporter.

"We're going to make sure the American people know the truth," he said. "You watch what happens between now and Election Day and see if I keep my word to you."

Former Clinton aides are taking on larger roles in the campaign. Kerry has moved John Sasso, a longtime adviser and Boston operative who once ran the presidential campaign of Michael Dukakis, from the Democratic National Committee to a top spot inside his campaign.

In Pennsylvania, Kerry said the race is about Bush's policies that "have taken America backward" on the economy, wages, health care and the environment.

"This race is about the last four years and the next four years," Kerry said. "They've made the wrong choices. They've got the wrong policies. They're moving in the wrong direction."

On Iraq, Bush "rushed to war without a plan to win the peace," Kerry said. Bush failed to build an international coalition to share the cost and the manpower, and wrongly shifted the focus of the anti-terrorism campaign from Afghanistan and al-Qaeda to Iraq and Saddam Hussein.

IRAQ | Saddam aide possibly leading insurgency

beginning of military operations in Iraq in March 2003, according to the Defense Department.

U.S. forces have not patrolled inside Fallujah since April, when U.S. Marines ended a three-week siege. The city has since fallen into the hands of insurgents who have used it as a base to manufacture car bombs and launch attacks on U.S. and Iraqi government forces.

The U.S. military has retaliated by launching several airstrikes on insurgent safe-houses in the city.

Monday's deaths were the largest number of Americans killed in combat in a single day since May 2, when nine U.S.

troops died in separate mortar attacks and roadside bombings in Baghdad, Ramadi and Kirkuk.

Seven troops were killed on two days last month, but in each case, there were six Americans and one foreign coalition member who died. On Aug. 21, six U.S. service members and one Polish soldier died in combat, and six were killed on Aug. 15, along with a Ukrainian soldier.

On Sunday, Iraqi officials said they had nabbed al-Douri — the most-wanted member of Saddam's regime — during a shootout north of Baghdad, but later in the day the Iraqi defense minister said word of his arrest was "baseless."

"The required tests to identify him showed that he is not Izzat al-Douri," Kadhim told the Associated Press.

There have been incorrect reports of al-Douri's arrest in the past.

American officials believe al-Douri — Saddam's former right-hand man — is organizing the 16-month insurgency that has plagued U.S. forces here.

He is No. 6 on the U.S. military's list of 55 most-wanted figures from Saddam's regime — the king of clubs in the deck of cards — and U.S. forces have offered a $10 million bounty for his arrest. Forty-four of the people on the list already have been killed or captured.

Saddam was arrested on Dec. 13, hiding in a tiny underground bunker near Adwar.

Races for Kansas House remain largely uncontested

By John Hanna
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA, Kan. — Nearly half of the races for the Kansas House are uncontested in this year's general election.

With Labor Day traditionally starting the campaign season and all 125 seats to be filled Nov. 2, 40 Republicans and 19 Democrats face no opposition. The number is in keeping with trends in recent years, though the number of uncontested races has increased since the early and mid-1990s.

"The number is still amazingly high to me," Secretary of State Ron Thornburgh said.

All 40 Senate seats also are on the ballot. Seven Republicans and one Democrat, David Haley, of Kansas City, face no opposition. Republicans have majorities of 30-10 in the Senate and 80-45 in the House.

Sixty-two House races were uncontested in the 2002 general election, 57 in 2000 and 56 in 1998, according to the secretary of state's office.

But the numbers were lower before then: 37 in 1996, 36 in 1994, only 19 in 1992 and 25 in 1990. Democrats captured a House majority in 1990; Republicans retook it two years later.

House Speaker Doug Mays, R-Topeka, and Minority Leader Dennis McKinney, D-Greensburg, said recruiting candidates can be difficult because those candidates must sacrifice time with their families and jobs. Campaigning door-to-door remains important for most House candidates.

"It's really quite a commitment," Mays said. "Not everyone wants to make that commitment."

McKinney said some Democrats also hesitate to challenge Republican incumbents they perceive as moderate, considering them acceptable and likely to win anyway.

Uncontested general election races can reflect one party's dominance in an area, with the GOP having a long-standing advantage statewide.

For example, Republicans running in 10 of Johnson County's 21 House districts are unopposed, and the GOP dominates there.

U.S. military death toll hits 1,000 in Iraq

By Hamza Hendawi
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — U.S. military deaths in the Iraq campaign passed 1,000 Tuesday, an Associated Press tally showed, as a spike in fighting with Sunni and Shiite insurgents killed seven Americans in the Baghdad area.

The count includes 998 U.S. troops and three civilian contractors killed while working for the Pentagon. The tally was compiled by the AP based on Pentagon records, AP reporting from Iraq and reports from soldiers' families.

It includes deaths from hostile and non-hostile causes since President Bush launched the Iraq campaign in March 2003 to topple the regime of Saddam Hussein.

The grim milestone was surpassed after a spike in fighting, which has killed 14 American service members in the past two days. Two soldiers died in clashes Tuesday with militiamen loyal to rebel Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. Five other Americans died Tuesday in separate attacks, mostly in the Baghdad area.

West of the capital, U.S. warplanes swooped low over Fallujah Tuesday in airstrikes after seven Marines and three Iraqi soldiers were killed the day before in a car-bombing near the Sunni insurgent-controlled city.

A group linked to Jordanian-born militant Abu Musab al-Zarqawi — Tawhid and Jihad — posted a statement on a militant Web site claiming responsibility for the attack, describing it as "a martyr operation ... that targeted American soldiers and their mercenary apostate collaborators from the Iraqi army."

During a news conference at the Pentagon, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld anticipated the tally would surpass 1,000 and sought to play down the milestone.

"When combined with U.S. losses in other theaters in the global war on terror, we have lost well more than a thousand already," he said.

Rumsfeld said the United States and its allies would not be swayed. Those who believe deaths would be a deterrent, he said, "underestimated our country, our coalition. They have failed to understand the character of our people. And they certainly misread our commander in chief."

The Bush administration has long linked the Iraq conflict to

Officials table NISTAC proposal

Commissioners hear request for campus building

By Stephanie Swoboda
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The City Commission tabled a proposal Tuesday night that would involve a $6 million purchase of a K-State building.

After three hours and 15 minutes of debate, City Commission members tabled the proposal brought to them by a local company, the National Institute for Strategic Technology Acquisition and Commercialization, or NISTAC.

Commissioners voted on the length of the bond, passing the proposal with three votes.

The company wants the city and K-State to enter into a partnership with them to improve the economy of Manhattan with the money allocated for such as purpose.

NISTAC President Ron Sampson, along with financial director Bernie Hayen and other NISTAC members, proposed that the city purchase a $6 million building on the K-State campus for use by their company.

The building is in K-State Research Park, and the company would be host to many biological research companies. One such company that NISTAC already houses is Nutra-Joy, better known as the maker of Cal-C.

While NISTAC sings the praises of Cal-C, they are wanting to house more of these types of companies and keep them locally owned.

"Our real intent is to act as an incubator, to spin out the kind of companies that are making products that will get shipped somewhere else," Sampson said.

Sampson is hoping to sell the current building in which NISTAC is in, and with the help of bond money and loans, get the business up and running.

The new half-cent sales tax, money would be used to buy the 60-million dollar building for the company. While spending

Fuel, electric power combine for enviro-friendly vehicle

By Annette Lawless
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An alternative to gasoline-powered vehicles — though it has been around for several years — is beginning to creep its way into mainstream culture.

"With gasoline prices so high, some people are looking for fuel-cutting alternatives, including purchasing the more environmentally friendly hybrid vehicles on the market," Tom Shawler, Auto Search Inc. co-owner, said. "People are stepping along with the automotive industry trends."

"Actually, it's more than just gasoline," Shawler said. "People are extremely excited with any new vehicle on the market," he said.

"Quality — that is what exactly the hybrid can provide for you," said Rick Schwerdtfeger, Little Apple Toyota Honda sales associate. "Sales have gone up so much over the year, with us producing at least one hybrid a month."

Ray Yunk, assistant professor in architectural engineering and construction sciences, purchased a Toyota Prius last November. He said he was more than satisfied with his vehicle.

"I was really impressed by the technology in the hybrid system," Yunk said. "It is quite a major change from a conventional car."

"With the demand so high, some people have to wait up to eight months before they get their car," Schwerdtfeger said. "Some people don't mind waiting that long for the benefits, though."

Hybrids operate on both fuel and electric power, saving people about half the costs of gasoline, Schwerdtfeger said.

"The vehicle's electric power is self-charging," he said. "When you use your brakes, the electric power is recharging itself."

Yunk said the car reports what type of fuel you are using, whether it be electric power, gasoline or both.

George Scharff, Dick Edwards Internet sales coordinator, said he thinks hybrid cars are among the best on the market.

Scharff said the newest example of this technology, the 2005 Ford Escape Hybrid, is perhaps the cleanest, most efficient vehicle on the market.

"It has great acceleration performance, an awesome fuel economy, and cleaner fuel emissions,"

New KU organization goes to the dogs

LAWRENCE, Kan. — Bryant Freeman has loved dogs for as long as he can remember.

"I was born and raised in a kennel," said Freeman, director of the University of Kansas Institute of Haitian Studies. "When I went to my first dog show, I was still in the cradle."

Because of his passion for dogs, he decided it was time to start a club for dog lovers at the University of Kansas. He said he'd considered starting the club before, but now the KU Dog Lovers Club will be a reality.

The club's purpose, Freeman said, would be to bring together dog lovers on campus. Freeman said owning a dog is not a prerequisite for membership.

He said he hopes the club would inspire people to be responsible dog owners. The acronym for the KU Dog Lovers will be KUDL, Freeman said.

Freeman said he envisioned students running the club once it was formed, but he would be happy to be the adviser. Freeman said the student members of the club would decide how often the club might convene, but he guessed the club might meet once a month.

Freeman said the students who run the club would decide what the club would do. Freeman said the club's members might decide to take trips with their dogs to places like Mutt Run by Clinton Lake where dogs wouldn't have to be on a leash. The club also would host speakers and watch videos about dogs, he said.

Freeman said though he didn't have a vendetta against cats, the club's focus would be dogs.

"I don't relate to cats," Freeman said. "I've just never had one. This is for dogs."

Pearson Publishing, students get a discount on the purchase of remotes, sometimes called "clickers" by faculty members, when they purchase new Pearson textbooks for courses requiring the devices.

Michael Dini, associate professor of biological sciences, said he plans to begin using the system in his sections of Biology I soon.

Dini said he will use the system for administering quizzes to test student comprehension of the material he covers in lectures.

"What it allows me to do is to determine whether the students got it, or if they did not get it," he said. "If they did not get it, I can address it right then and there."

Students are charged for use of the remote when it is purchased at the bookstore, Dini said.

"You buy the unit for $30; it's a one-time fee," Dini said. "In your textbook there is a rebate card that, if you send it in, you get a $25 rebate, so it really only ends up costing the student $5."

DRUNK IN WISCONSIN

MADISON, Wis. — A survey in the September issue of Men's Health Magazine has ranked Madison, Wisc., the 11th most dangerously drunk city in the nation.

The list, which includes the 101 largest cities in the United States, used DWI arrest rates, alcohol-related traffic deaths and mortality rates for alcohol-related liver disease to rank which cities were the most "dangerously drunk."

With a higher score representing a more inebriated city, Madison was ranked more drunk than larger cities such as Minneapolis (13), Chicago (42) and New York (95).

Lt. Stephanie Bradley Wilson of the Madison Police Department said there were 1,352 drunken driving arrests in 2003, including 582 in which the driver was beyond the legal alcohol limit and 770 in which the driver was under the influence. Ten of the 14 fatal traffic accidents in 2003 were alcohol related, Bradley Wilson said.

According to the Madison Department of Transportation 2003 crash report, 23 of the 97 crashes involving pedestrians were related to alcohol. Of the 97 reported bicycle crashes, a quarter involved people between the ages of 20 and 24, and two cases noted the biker as drinking.

The report also noted four moped crashes involving alcohol in 2003.

Officials predict $422 billion deficit

By Alan Fram
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The Congressional Budget Office projected Tuesday this election year's federal deficit will hit a record $422 billion, a shortfall smaller than analysts predicted earlier this year.

The estimate by Congress' nonpartisan budget experts immediately provided political fodder for both parties in the final two-month stretch of the presidential and congressional campaigns.

Focusing on a $55 billion improvement since the budget office last estimated this year's shortfall in March, Republicans hailed the figures as good news.

"The CBO estimates show exactly the same trend" that the White House projected last month, said White House budget office spokesman Chad Kolton. "The president's tax relief is working, and the strengthening economy is helping to bring down the deficit in 2004."

"This report underscores that our policies are working to create a stronger economy, more jobs and a lower deficit," said House Budget Chairman Jim Nussle, R-Iowa.

Democrats emphasized that despite the improvement, the $422 billion would be the biggest deficit ever in dollars, surpassing last year's record $375 billion.

From the campaign trail, Democratic presidential candidate Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts weighed in.

"Only George W. Bush could celebrate over a record budget deficit of $422 billion, a loss of 1.6 million jobs and Medicare premiums that are up by a record 17 percent," Kerry said.

"There is no way to portray a record deficit as good news," said Rep. John Spratt of South Carolina, top Democrat on the House Budget Committee. "From any perspective, today's deficit numbers are a cause for alarm and a call to action."

Tuesday's figures don't include costly steps that many expect lawmakers to take that would swell the red ink further.

These include making tax cuts that Bush has won permanently, and easing the gradually growing impact on middle-class taxpayers of the alternative minimum tax, which was initially aimed at the wealthy.

The CBO report said next year's deficit would shrink to $348 billion, which would be the third largest ever in dollar terms. That would be $15 billion less than it projected last March, but $17 billion higher than the White House estimated in July.

While the congressional analysts improved their short-term budget projections, their long-term forecast has worsened since last March.

Over the 10 years ending in 2014, the analysts now envision deficits totaling nearly $2.3 trillion — almost $300 billion worse than they projected in March.

The increase is largely due to an assumption that extra spending enacted this year for Iraq, Afghanistan and overall defense needs will be continued annually over the next decade. The validity of that assumption is likely to be grounds for more partisan battling.

Though the budget office sees a healthy economy over the next two years, the report warned that the approaching retirement of the baby boom generation means that serious problems loom with growing pressure on Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid.

When adjusted to erase the effects of inflation, the projected $422 billion deficit projected for 2004 would exceed the value of every annual shortfall since World War II.

Tuesday's CBO estimate should prove fairly accurate because the federal budget year, which runs through Sept. 30, has less than one month to go. But it does not include the $2 billion in aid for repairing hurricane damage in Florida that President Bush requested Monday.

The government is expected to spend about $2.3 trillion this year, which means it will be borrowing about one of every five dollars it spends.

The $422 billion projection for 2004 echoed a preliminary estimate the budget office made last month.

It was an improvement from its $477 billion forecast in January, a revision the office attributed mostly to stronger than anticipated revenue collections.

Afternoon accident

An accident slowed traffic at 5:30 p.m. Tuesday at the corner of Juliette and Bluemont avenues. Megan Elmore, freshman in open-option, was turning onto Bluemont from Juliette in her green Chevrolet car when she crashed into the side of the gold Honda car, Riley County Police Officer Kevin Walter said. The driver of the Honda was traveling westbound on Bluemont when struck.

K-State gains record-high enrollment numbers for top high school students

By Elena McVicar
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This year, a record 298 freshmen are at K-State who graduated first in their high school class.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said the enrollment of many top-ranked high school students has been President Jon Wefald's goal since he arrived at K-State in 1986.

"We've gone from 149 first-in-class students in 1988 to this year's record enrollment."

"It's fun recruiting individuals who are first in their graduating class," Bosco said.

"They are extremely active in school, church, and their community and here they have lots of choices. For them to choose to be part of the K-State family is pretty neat."

Kristin Shaw, admissions representative, said a lot of first-in-class students are looking for a well-rounded class experience, which is why they choose K-State.

K-State has a strong academic life, residential life, leadership studies and many opportunities for undergraduate research as well as opportunities to get involved the very first day, Bosco said.

Joe Vossen, freshman in political science, is one of the 298 first-in-class students.

"I chose K-State because they took a personal approach to recruit me," Vossen said. "They also offered good scholarships to those who graduated first-in-class."

Vossen said he expects others to be very active on campus, something that appeals to first-in-class students like himself.

Even though first-in-class students are highly sought after, they aren't the only ones K-State recruits, Bosco said.

"Our bread-and-butter student is a student who is focused on academics and comes to K-State with great energy and a great interest in furthering their academic goals," Bosco said.

"First-in-class is nice, but this freshman class has student leaders — students who contributed in and out of the classroom. This may be the best freshman class ever."

TO THE POINT Campaigns need renewed focus on war in Iraq

On the campaign trail, George W. Bush and John Kerry are fighting about a war.

It's not the war that is going on now — the one in which 1,000 Americans have died as of Tuesday.

No, they are fighting about a war that ended more than 30 years ago.

Vietnam War medals, voting records and grammatical errors during speeches have been the focus of the presidential campaigns.

But neither camp has provided a solid solution for ending the violence in Iraq. More and more Americans continue to give their lives to occupy or liberate Iraq, yet we have no plan to end the violence and bring lasting peace.

Party affiliations aside, voters must demand a workable solution from each candidate to stop the killing.

The candidates call this the most important election of our lives.

Going to the polls without the most important information would be a violation of our civic duty. It would be disrespectful to the soldiers and their families and to the American public in general.

Both candidates must place focus on this important issue — to be advocates for peace, both here and abroad.

New directions

Democratic senator crosses party lines to speak at GOP convention, maintains appropriate balance

When Senator Zell Miller, a Democrat from Georgia, was announced as a keynote speaker at the Republican National Convention, many were surprised at this leap across party lines.

Then, when he used his time at the lectern to berate Sen. John Kerry, many in the media and public were downright shocked at his willingness to damage his own party.

Not me. I saw this coming a long time ago. After all, Miller is my favorite elected Democrat. Zell Miller has been a Marine and has held office in each of the past six decades.

He is angry with his party and is trying to make a difference. He's the leader of Democrats for Bush, a group whose beliefs are self-explanatory.

After his speech before the RNC, Miller sat down with pundits and press, and he stopped just short of challenging Chris Matthews to a duel.

From what I hear, Sen. Miller has a long line of people willing to be his second.

Also explaining his actions, his book, "A National Party No More: The Conscience of a Conservative Democrat," released last year, is a scathing trip to the woodshed for Miller's party.

According to Charlie Cook, who wrote the book's forward, Miller, like Howard Dean, feels that the Democratic Party lacks direction, vision and leadership.

There are some things you learn about ol' Zell Miller. Born and raised in the Georgia mountain town of Young Harris, Sen. Miller is a "dyed-in-the-wool" Democrat, a phrase he often uses to explain why he never became a Republican.

He explains his centrism, perhaps right-wing, view of the world as a result of a bout with his conscience. He's always believed what he does now, but for the large part of history he was less vocal about how he felt.

When he left the office of governor in 1998, he had an 85 percent approval rating. In 1990, when he was running for the position, Miller hired Paul Begala and James Carville as his top campaign advisors.

The two went on to help Bill Clinton win the presidency and have been hosting CNN's "Crossfire" for several years opposite Robert Novak and Tucker Carlson.

According to the New York Times, the two are, ironically enough, going to become advisors in Kerry's campaign for the next two months. They'll be on the campaign that's being attacked by their first great success.

Miller supported the No Child Left Behind legislation, but his implementation of the HOPE scholarship in Georgia is his greatest gift to education.

Now any student in Georgia who maintains a B average in high school is guaranteed a free education in college as long as he or she can maintain that 3.0 GPA.

Even more amazing is that he lowered taxes while instituting this policy.

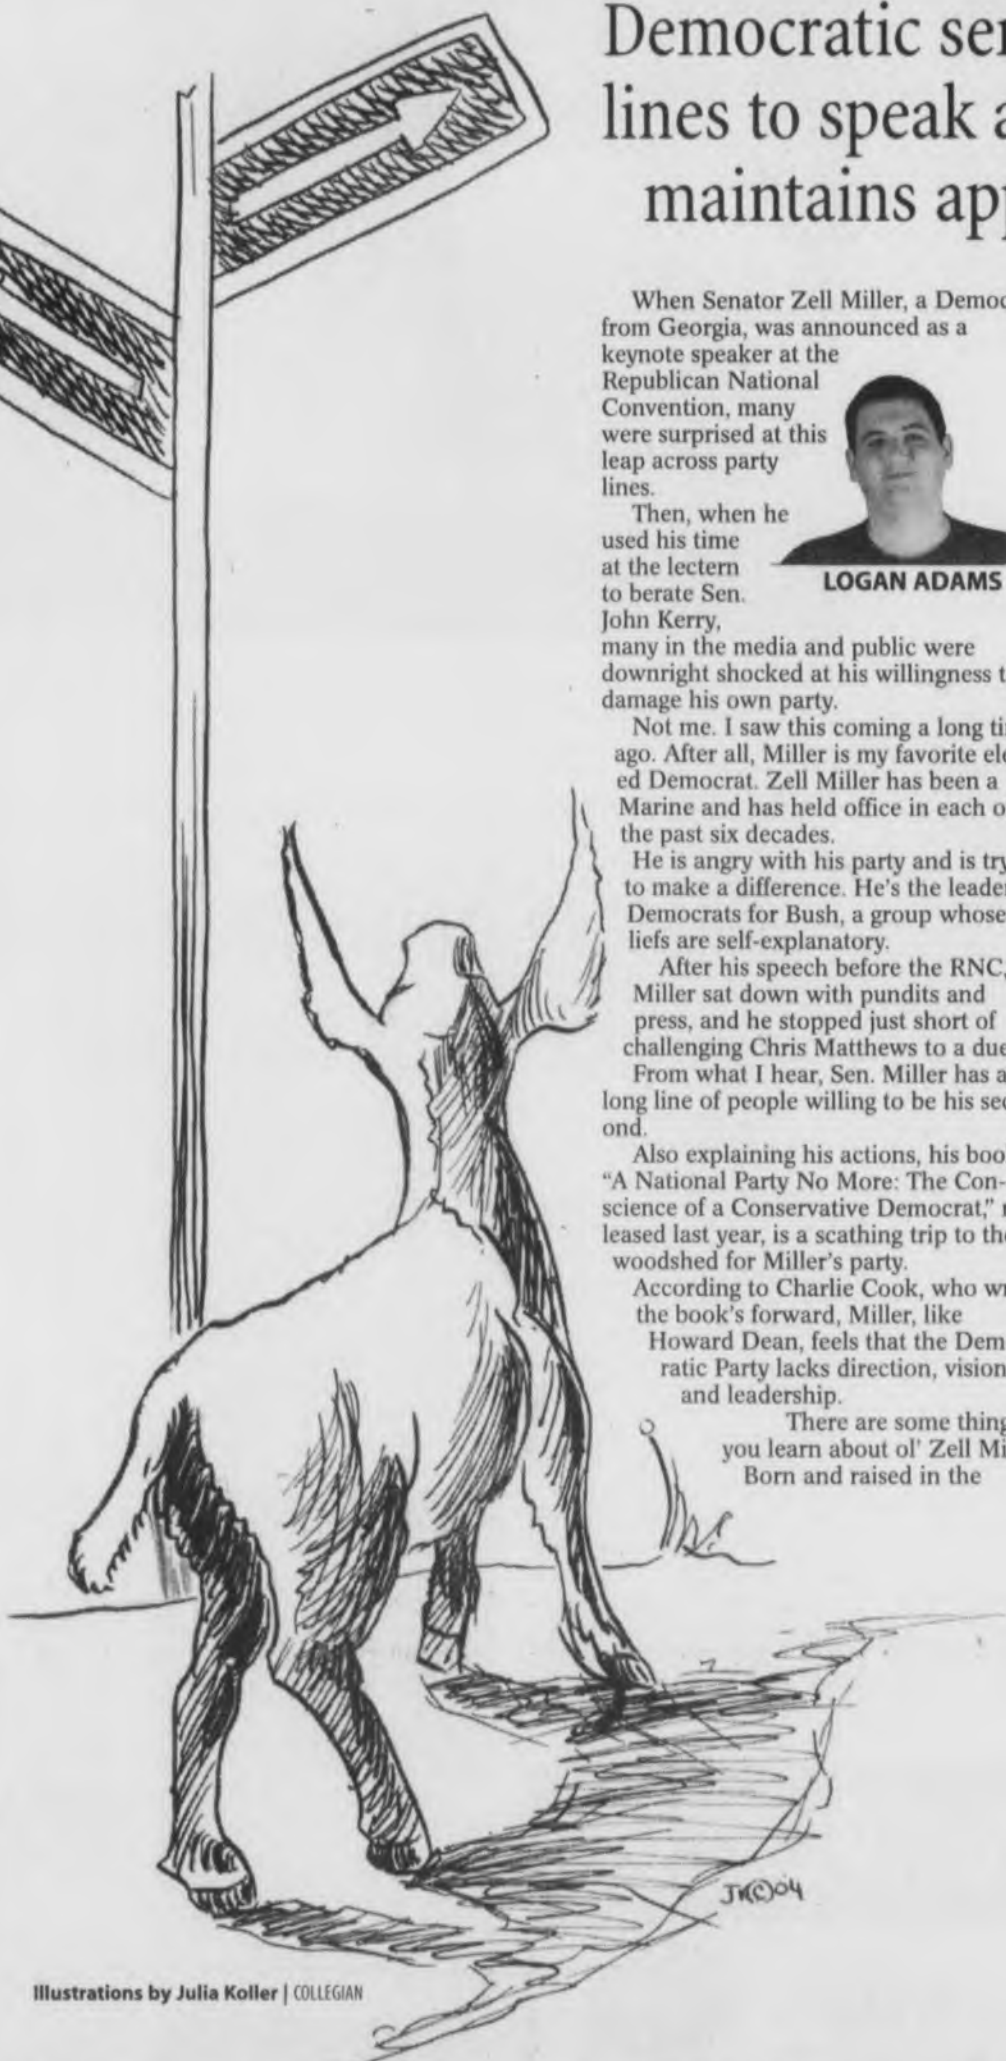

Now I wish Sen. Miller had run for president this year. However, the senator has made clear that he will retire when his current term is up, and it's a shame, too.

It's a shame we can't have a candidate that both sides can work. It's terrible that we have so much no-man's-land between the right and the left, especially since that is where the majority of Americans stand.

I, and many others, like Sen. Zell Miller because he cares so much more about the wants and needs of the people than about what he personally wants.

That's something I can't say about Kerry or Bush.

Bush presidency serves as cautionary tale

OK kiddies, it's story time.

Once upon a time, there was a large-eared Republican from Texas who wanted to run for president. He preached the "compassionate conservative" philosophy.

He promised to end terrorism, improve our economy and schools and control spending. Can any of you tell me during what year that happened in?

Well that gets interesting. You see, that's Bush's platform for this year's presidential race, as well as the 2000 presidential race.

The message of this fact is clear and simple: George Bush is not an effective president.

Statistics show that not only are things not getting better for America, but that they are getting worse as Bush's presidency continues.

For example, according to Fox News, the June unemployment rate was at 6.4 percent. That's the highest it's been in nine years.

Way to go with those sweeping economic reforms, Mr. President.

Another huge (and I mean huge) coincidence can be found in the census results that were released to the public last week.

The results show that not only do 1.3 million more Americans live below the poverty level, 1.4 million more Americans are without health insurance than this time last year.

This is the third consecutive year with increases in these two areas, all within Bush's term.

Also, Bush's No Child Left Behind Act has caused major problems for schools nationwide.

Expensive testing methods and teacher training are parts of this act, yet there is very little funding to help with either aspect.

Schools therefore must decide between spending money on teaching core lessons or spending money updating their education system to meet with the president's new education standards.

The biggest issue on the race agenda is the war on terror.

President Bush rode into a war with Iraq like a cowboy hopped up on speed. Yeehaw!

Likewise was his enthusiasm for the war on terrorism. Wait, I forgot. They were supposed to be the same thing.

In February, Bush told our soldiers that we were winning the war on terror and that "the enemy will be defeated."

Now he's back-peddling faster than you can say "nothing will hold us back" 50 times (which is about how many times he said the phrase in his nomination speech).

Suddenly, our president doesn't think we can win the war on terrorism. Nope, that's it. No question. We just can't do it now. He thought we could, but he was wrong. Whoops!

In November, I ask you to consider this: Do you want a repeat of the last four years?

Because if George W. Bush is elected for another term in office, it looks as though the future of our country will be headed nowhere.

It's OK Barbara, the other 97 percent of athletes will be digging ditches for me anyway.

Triangle man hates partide man. If they ever fight, triangle wins.

If Barbara Meyer thinks academics at K-State are a joke and that football is so evil, perhaps she should transfer to an Ivy League school. I'm sure she'd be happier there and not have to worry about student athlete rapists.

To the girl whose life I saved at the football game: next time, give me your number.

To the girl in personnel law, participation does not count as asking when the test is. Yeah, we saw you sign the sheet.

Dishwashing detergent is kept under the sink.

To the stupid sorority girl who tried to jack my parking space, never mess with a girl who drives a Dodge Ram.

With all the impotence and lunacy of the Kerry campaign right now, how do you think the Kerry presidency would go?

Do not forget Barbara Meyer, the football team has brought in more money than the political science department or the English department ever will.

I'm not sure, but I think at my job I import drugs. The reason I'm not sure is because my professor doesn't give me much background information about what I'm doing, but it definitely seems fishy.

To the Johnson County kids with GPS locators: is there anything your mommy and daddy don't buy for you.

I like K-State football. Yippee!

So I'm watching the President in Missouri, and all he can do is throw out names of other people that have done stuff just to get cheers.

Barbara Meyer, don't be ragging on the football team for getting credit for their class for their sport when all the other sports are allowed to do it also.

The number of American casualties last month was the highest ever in the war on Iraq. Thank you Bush Administration for attacking and

Rent to stay unchanged as owners gather tenants

Officials representing newly constructed apartment complexes in the area do not expect the expanded living spaces to remain vacant any time soon.

stay neat and clean."

The construction of the new apartments will not affect the rent, Irvine said.

"Rent will stay the same as it has been this year," she said. "The cost of building is expensive, so rent is more expensive."

Irvine said that it is not just the student population that affects the high demand for housing.

"More people are going to the university, and families from Fort Riley are looking for places to live," she said. "There always has been a high demand for living space in this area."

McCullough Development maintains housing for students in many apartment buildings and houses made into apartments.

"There appears an increased demand for students and military," Ben McCullough said.

"Everything has been built from your basic dwellings to very nice places."

E.G. Taylor, assistant manager of University Commons, said if rent has gone down, it hasn't been due to stiff competition.

"We are doing very well. There are single vacancies, but we don't have any open apartments," he said.

University Commons lowered rent after a decision was made to provide cable television access as an option, Taylor said.

"We also allowed four people to rent out an apartment together," Taylor said.

"If they did that, then rent was lowered to $250 a month."

Taylor agreed that the demand in Manhattan for housing far outweighs the supply.

"The majority of people that live here are college students," he said. "But we rent out to anyone."

Russians rally for peace outside Kremlin after school seizures

Politicians call for internal investigation into Putin's handling of ongoing crisis with Chechnya

By Maria Danilova
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MOSCOW — Tens of thousands of people answered a government call Tuesday and rallied outside the Kremlin in a show of solidarity against terrorism, nearly a week after militants seized a school in southern Russia in a standoff that claimed more than 350 lives, many of them children.

Mourners in the grief-stricken city of Beslan lowered caskets into the damp earth in a third day of burials from the siege, which officials have blamed on Chechens and other Islamic militants.

The Moscow crowd of about 130,000 people — some bearing banners saying, "We won't give Russia to terrorists" and "The enemy will be crushed; victory will be ours" — observed a moment of silence at 5 p.m. on the cobblestones near St. Basil's Cathedral, adjacent to the Kremlin.

The hourlong demonstration, which was organized by a pro-government trade union, echoed President Vladimir Putin's call for unity in vast, multiethnic Russia and sought to rally its people against enemies he says have aid from abroad.

"I have been crying for so many days, and I came here to feel that we are actually together," Vera Danilina said.

Although some in Beslan have criticized Putin for not meeting with survivors of the tragedy, the president has avoided the brunt of the anger over the attacks.

"Of course I support him, and it's necessary to be even more harsh with terrorists," said Galina Kiselyova, a history teacher who was at the Moscow rally. "We cannot let go of Chechnya — the Caucasus is ours."

"Putin, we're with you," read a banner at the rally.

The demonstration was heavily advertised on state-controlled television, with prominent actors appealing to citizens to turn out. Banners bore the white, blue and red of Russia's flag, and speakers echoed Putin's statements that terrorists must be crushed.

"We came here to show that we are not indifferent to the series of terrorist acts that have taken place," said Alexander, a student at a Moscow technical college who did not give his surname.

However, the 18-year-old criticized Russian authorities' handling of the hostage crisis, and noted the rally was organized by authorities who "told us where and when to come" and was not spontaneous.

Militants seized the school in Beslan on Sept. 1, a day after a suicide bombing in Moscow killed 10 people and just over a week after two Russian passenger planes crashed following explosions and killed all 90 people aboard — attacks authorities suspect were linked to the war in Chechnya.

In footage broadcast Tuesday on NTV television, hundreds of hostages were shown seated in the school's cramped gym. Many of them had their hands behind their heads. A thick streak of blood stained the wood floor.

Football-sized bundles of explosives were attached to wires and strings hanging from the two basketball hoops. One attacker in camouflage and a black hood stood amid the hostages with a boot on what NTV said was a book rigged with a detonator.

In an interview late Monday, Putin angrily denied his government should overhaul its policy on Chechnya because of the attacks.

The world should have "no more questions about our policy in Chechnya" after the attackers shot children in the back, he told visiting foreign journalists and academics.

He said the Chechen militant cause was aimed at fomenting conflict in southern Russia and breaking up the country.

Putin also said his government would conduct an internal investigation but no public inquiry into the siege, warning that a parliamentary probe could turn into "a political show."

Two opposition politicians have called for an investigation, including into whether the authorities had prior information about planned terrorist attacks and what the government was doing to stabilize the situation in Chechnya, where deadly fighting persists a decade after Russian forces first moved to crush separatists.

Putin rejected calls for negotiations with Chechen rebel representatives.

"Why don't you meet Osama bin Laden, invite him to Brussels or to the White House and engage in talks, ask him what he wants and give it to him so he leaves you in peace?" Britain's Guardian newspaper quoted Putin as saying.

"You find it possible to set some limitations in your dealings with these bastards, so why should we talk to people who are child-killers?"

Differing with Putin, the Bush administration said only a political settlement could end the Chechen crisis.

State Department spokesman Richard Boucher said U.S. officials had met with Chechens in the past, although "we do not meet with terrorists." There may be additional meetings in the future, though none are planned, he said.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld condemned the killings in Beslan, saying "civilized people can only express sympathy and solidarity with the Russian people."

The Foreign Ministry said Russia will take new steps seeking the extradition of people it says are linked with terrorism, including Chechen rebel representatives Akhmed Zakayev and Ilyas Akhmadov.

Zakayev, an envoy for separatist former Chechen President Aslan Maskhadov, has been granted asylum in Britain and Akhmadov in the United States.

Cats seek to improve before game Saturday

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State (1-0) will get its first real test of the season Saturday when the Fresno State Bulldogs (1-0) come to town to take on the No. 13 Wildcats.

K-State is coming off a 27-13 win against Western Kentucky, a game in which the Wildcats put up more than 500 yards of total offense, and senior running back Darren Sproles registered 221 yards rushing.

The Bulldogs beat up the Washington Huskies 35-16 in their season opener with the help of five Washington turnovers and three defensive touchdowns.

The game will mark the first time either school has faced each other and also will be K-State's first televised game of the season on Fox Sports Net.

EARLY START

The game will kick off at 11:10 a.m. Saturday, but Coach Bill Snyder said his players should be adjusted to early mornings by now.

"Our young guys are up pretty early, so I think they have a track record there," he said. "The important thing is that you try to get on a schedule and be consistent about the schedule. On Saturday, we will probably have them up around 7 a.m., and so it is important for them to get on that schedule right now for Saturday."

Snyder also said the early start could affect Fresno State, but the Bulldogs should be accustomed to the time change by Saturday's kickoff.

"You would think it could be, but they will be in here on Thursday, so they will have two days to get used to the time change," he said.

ROWING | Rowers earn academic honors

Three members of the women's rowing team have been rewarded for excellence in the classroom.

Seniors Linzi Hauldren, Elane Walker — who has completed her eligibility but will graduate in May — and Grace Riekenberg recently received National Scholar-Athlete Award honors from the Collegiate Rowing Coaches Association (CRCA).

The three Wildcats were among 124 Division I student-athletes to receive such an honor from the CRCA.

Hauldren holds a 3.53 grade-point average as an education major, and Riekenberg carries a 3.75 GPA as an English major.

Walker has a 3.51 GPA and will graduate with a bachelor's degree in math education and a minor in leadership studies.

To be eligible for CRCA academic honors, student-athletes must be in their second, third or fourth year of eligibility, participate in at least 75 percent of the season's varsity races, be nominated by a CRCA-member coach in good standing and have earned at least a 3.5 cumulative GPA through the fall semester of the current season.

Battle tested

Wildcats survive in-state match with 3-1 victory over Wichita

By Kent Hildebrand
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The women's volleyball team expected a battle Tuesday, and that's exactly what they got.

The 15th-ranked Wildcats outlasted in-state rival Wichita State 3-1 Tuesday night at Ahearn Field House. They took the first game 30-27, dropped a tight 35-33 decision, and then won the last two games 30-23 and 30-21 to take the match.

The win improves K-State's record to 4-1.

Coach Suzie Fritz said the play of the Shockers was no surprise.

"That's a very good volleyball team," she said.

"They ball control very well, they put up a good block, they hit good balls, they have no glaring weaknesses at all. I thought they put a tremendous amount of pressure on us. We knew from the very beginning that we would have to play well to win the match."

In the first game, K-State took advantage of some Wichita State mistakes to lead 20-14 before the Shockers fought back to take the lead, 25-23. K-State went on a run of its own to win the game 30-27.

Game two was tight throughout, with neither team taking control until the Shockers escaped with a 35-33 win.

Fritz said the loss didn't throw her team.

"You expect a battle," she said. "You don't expect to win 3-0 all the time. For me, it's just a matter of understanding that if you do the things you do well and execute at a high level, then things will eventually turn your way."

Things did turn the Wildcats' way as they won the next two games.

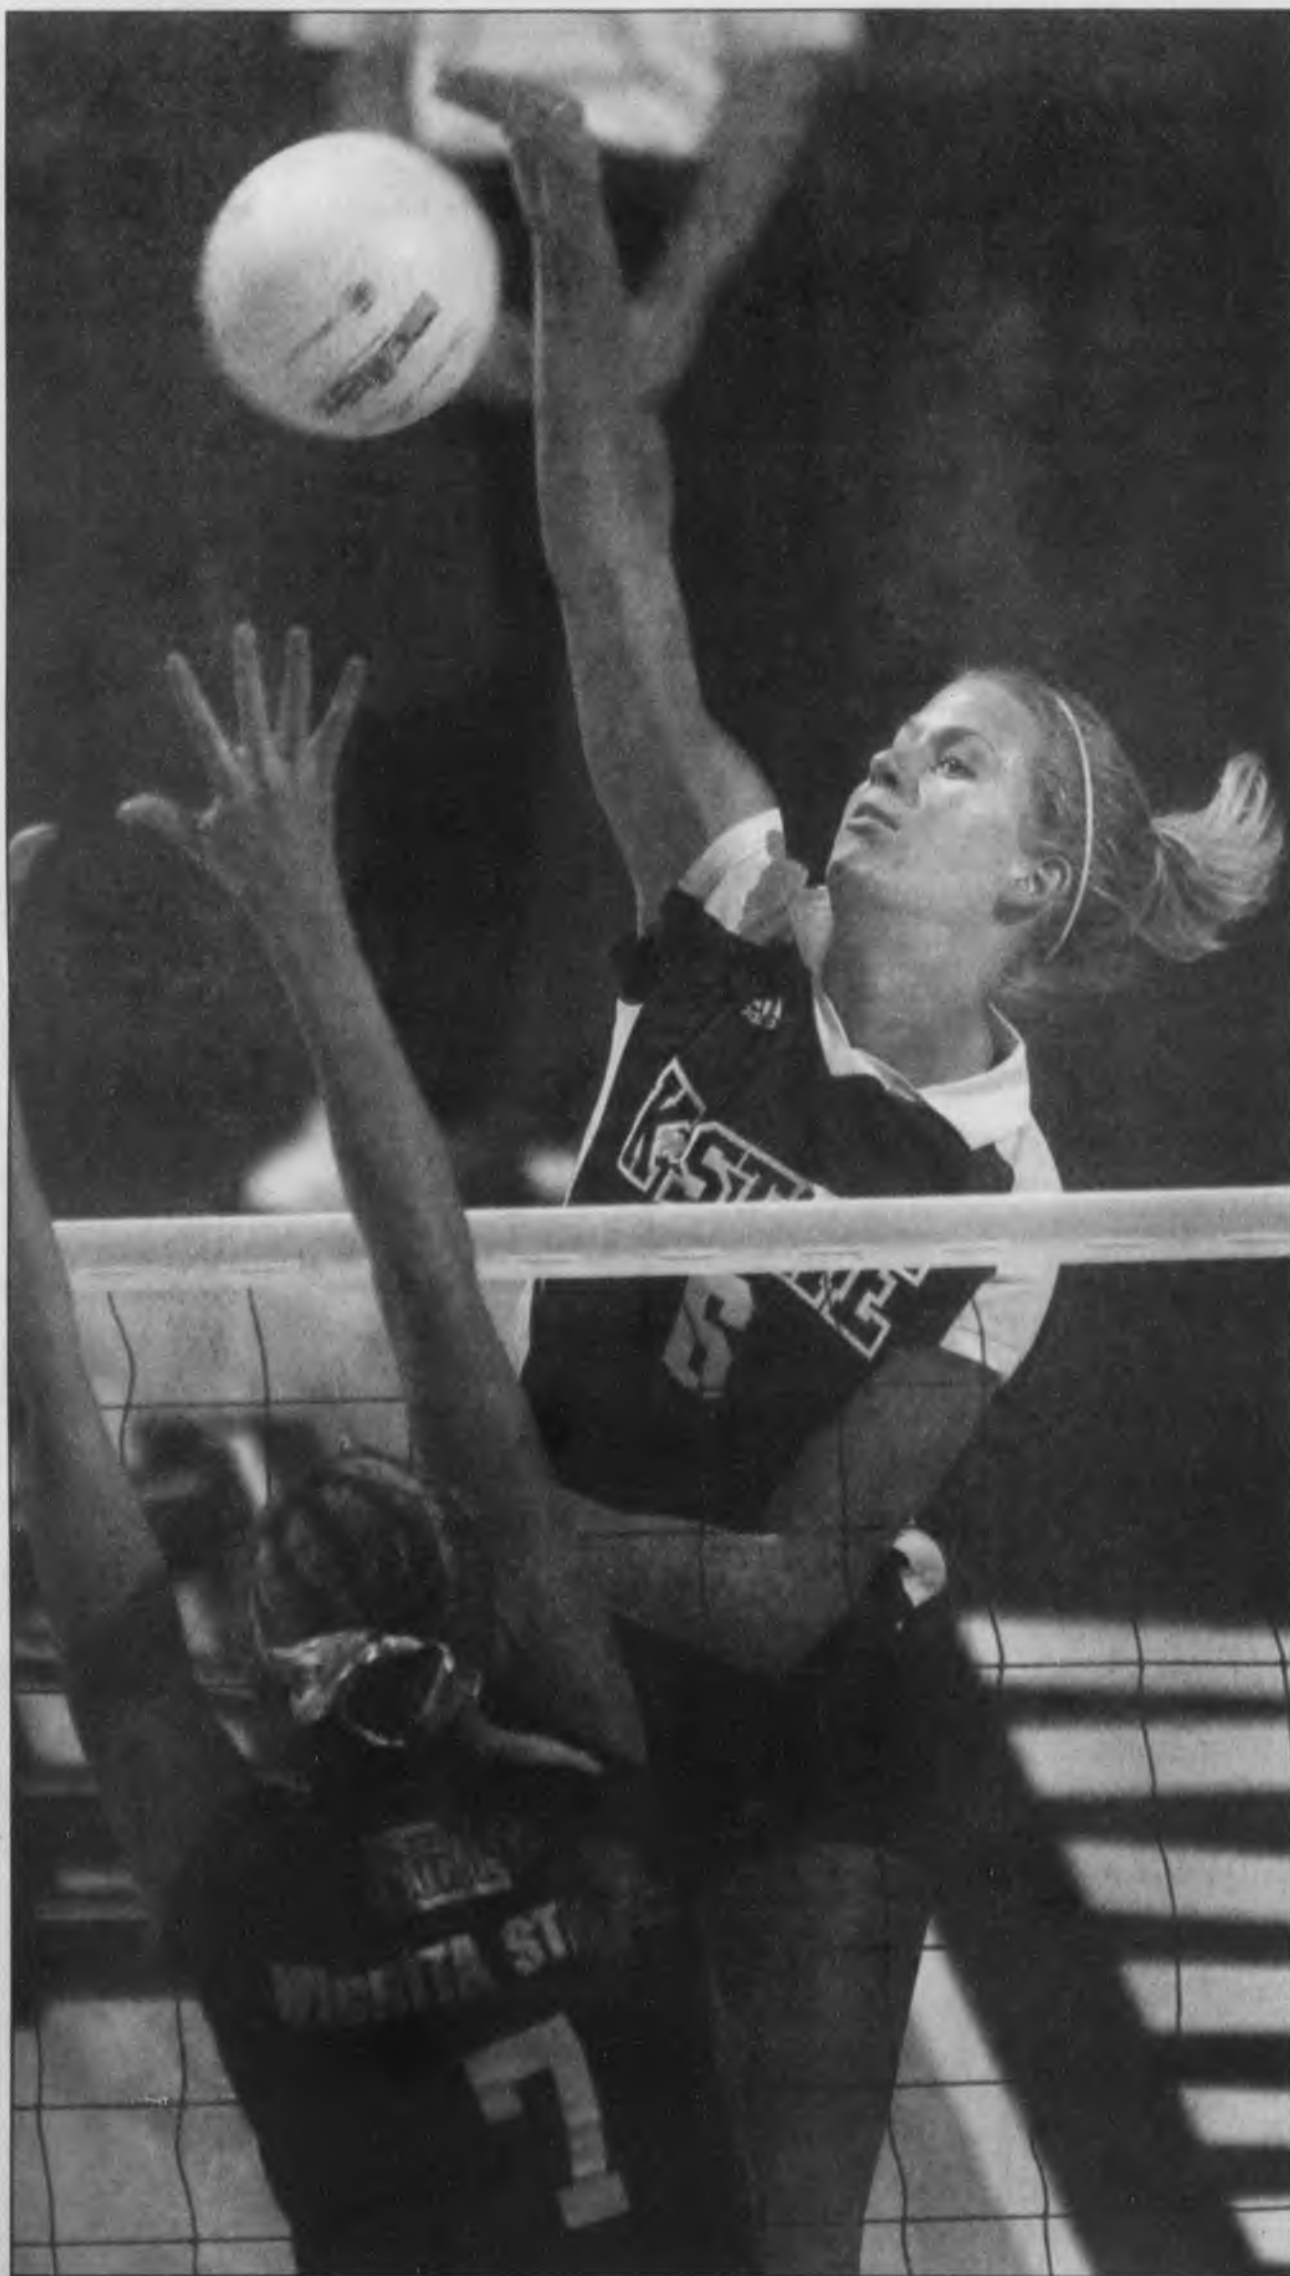

Sophomore outside hitter Sandy Werner said the loss helped motivate K-State for the rest of the match.

"We definitely battled with them and played point-for-point a lot of the time," she said. "I think after that close game we lost, we were all fired up and ready to go out there and give it our all."

"I think our team shows a lot of heart; even if we're down, we're still going to fight back, no matter how many points we're down. If they have 29, we're still going to fight back and try to win."

Werner contributed to the win with 20 kills, while senior setter Gabby Guerre came within two kills and two digs of a triple-double, finishing with 57 assists. Senior outside hitter Valeria Hejjas added 17 kills on 424 hitting.

The Wildcats have a day off before returning to action Thursday against fourth-ranked Florida at the Diet Coke Invitational in Minneapolis, Minn.

Sophomore outside hitter Sandy Werner goes up to make a kill against Wichita State's Dard Vohs during the fourth match of last night's game. The Cats won after playing that fourth and final match.

General | ESPN announces college sports initiative

ESPN will launch a new multimedia college sports initiative in March 2005 that includes a new 24-hour television network and content from ESPN.com and ESPN The Magazine.

ESPN will also include information from ESPN Radio, ESPN Mobile (wireless) and ESPN Broadband, George Bodenheimer, the president of ESPN and ABC Sports, said Tuesday.

Tuesday was also the 25th anniversary of the launch of ESPN.

The highest-profile facet of the new initiative will be the ESPNU television network, which will carry approximately 300 games live — primarily Division I football and men's and women's basketball — in the first year. The network also will cover baseball, softball, volleyball, lacrosse, hockey, wrestling, spring football and select high school football games.

It also will carry regular-season and NCAA championships, along with replays of games on ESPN, ESPN2, ABC and the company's regional networks.

Tennis | Capriati beats Williams amidst controversy

Unfairly, unbelievably, Serena Williams was robbed of a point by an umpire's mistake at the U.S. Open, just like her sister was at Wimbledon.

It happened in the opening game of the third set between Williams and Jennifer Capriati, who went on to win their Open quarterfinal 2-6, 6-4, 6-4 Tuesday night.

The match was tight and testy, the way it almost always has been during their 17 matches: contested calls, spiked rackets, some gamesmanship and strokes pounded with a lot of power.

Capriati played superbly, without a doubt, but what always will be remembered is the miscue by chair umpire Mariana Alves of Portugal. She awarded the point to Capriati after Williams hit a backhand that landed in — and was ruled good by the line judge.

Williams wound up losing that pivotal game, and though she did break right back, she was broken again to 2-1 and never recovered. TV replays also appeared to show at least two other incorrect calls that went against Williams in the final game, when Capriati needed three match points to serve it out.

Tuesday's encounter was their third straight quarterfinal at a Slam, and much like Venus Williams' loss to Lindsay Davenport in the fourth round Monday, this one could have been for the title. For the first time since 1998, both Williams sisters will end a season without a single Grand Slam title between them.

In the semifinals, the eighth-seeded Capriati will face No. 6 Elena Dementieva, who outlasted No. 2 Amelie Mauresmo 4-6, 6-4, 7-6 (1).

College season's 1st football games disappoint audiences

A few college football teams around the nation should be on suicide watch this week after several subpar opening-weekend performances by their kickers.

Equipment managers should keep a close eye on tape, shoelaces, towels or anything else one might use to end one's life.

MATTHEW GIRARD

The first full slate of games of the 2004 college football season showcased some of the worst field goal/extra point attempts at the most critical times of the game.

Northwestern kicker Brian Huffman missed on an astounding five field goal attempts in the Wildcats' double-overtime loss to TCU on Thursday. Huffman's misses included two in the second overtime that could have sealed a win for Northwestern.

Northwestern coach Randy Walker told the media after the game it would be easy to tag Huffman as the scapegoat for the loss.

I would say Walker pretty much hit the nail on the head with that quote.

Huffman's sole purpose on his football team is to kick the ball through the uprights. If I were Walker, I might think twice about going for three points on fourth down, no matter how far or close the team is to the end zone.

You would think — maybe after the first two or three misses — Walker might have went another direction. Either going for it or trying a back-up kicker might have given the Wildcats the win instead of losing by — gasp — three points.

At least Huffman's misses were field goals and not chip-shot extra points that ultimately cost the game, like Oregon State's Alexis Serna.

The Beavers had co-defending national champion LSU on the ropes Saturday. They were looking for the upset, but on three different occasions Serna couldn't connect on 20-yard extra point College is a time of change, and as people change, so do their relationships. Old friends may get replaced by new ones as people run in different circles.

For many entering college, the relationship they enjoyed with their high school sweetheart is the hardest to give up, but the bond may grow, as do the people in it for others.

One of the biggest issues facing couples undergoing the transition from high school to college is location.

Dorinda J. Lambert, associate director for clinical services at University Counseling Services, said couples who go to different schools have additional stress in their relationships. She said distance can be a problem if a lot of traveling is involved, especially if it is one-sided.

"Long-distance relationships require a great deal of effort," Lambert said. "Traveling every weekend makes it very difficult to settle into a new environment. Equitable relationships seem to grow better. If one (person in the relationship) feels they are working harder, then inequities can burn couples out."

Elise Barker, graduate student in English, said she felt distance led to a lot of problems in what was a long and, at times, unhealthy relationship with a former boyfriend, Aaron.

"Aaron was going to school (at KU) 200 miles away from me (at Bethany)," Barker said. "He went to Lindsborg more often than one would expect, but I ended up going to Lawrence more."

Barker said the relationship lasted from a few months before high school graduation through the second semester midterm of their sophomore year of college.

"Things went really well at first," Barker said. "But later on trips to see each other spread out more and more."

Barker said even though she hadn't been dating her boyfriend long when they came to college, the prospect of a long-distance relationship can bring doubts to even long-standing couples.

Jessica Schuler, sophomore in open-option, said she met her boyfriend during the summer before her freshman year of high school and started dating him the first day of her freshman year. They are still together.

Despite their history, Schuler said she feels that had they gone to different schools, the relationship would have changed.

"At the time I didn't believe long-distance relationships really worked," she said. "I think they struggle."

Schuler said many of her friends are in healthy long-distance relationships, and they can work despite the stress.

Lambert said some relationships can become troubled due to the added stress of college, and some relationships run into problems at peak stress times, such as midterms and finals.

Barker said she experienced this.

"He got depressed from not doing well in school," she said. "That's when the tumultuous stuff started happening."

Barker said her boyfriend broke up and got back together with her five times during the two-and-a-half-year relationship. She said most of the breakups coincided with finals, and the

Moore seeks Best Picture Oscar for 'Fahrenheit'

Michael Moore says he won't submit "Fahrenheit 9/11" for consideration as Best Documentary at this year's Academy Awards. Instead, he's going for the bigger prize of Best Picture.

Moore's critically acclaimed film slams President Bush's war on terror as ill-advised and corrupt. The movie has cheered Democrats but enraged the president's supporters, who booed Moore when he visited the Republican National Convention last week.

"For me, the real Oscar would be Bush's defeat on Nov. 2," Moore told the Associated Press during a phone interview Monday from New York.

Moore said he and his producing partner, Harvey Weinstein, agreed "Fahrenheit 9/11" would stand a better chance if they focused solely on the top Oscar.

He also said he wanted to be "supportive of my teammates in nonfiction film."

Jennings wins again

"Jeopardy!" master Ken Jennings has advanced his winning streak to 39, picking up another $10,001 and bringing his total winnings to $1,331,661.

The Salt Lake City software engineer became an unlikely TV star this summer when he began mowing down opponents on the quiz show. He won 38 straight games before the show went on hiatus in late July.

"Jeopardy!" limited its champions to five appearances before changing its rules a year ago, allowing a winner to keep competing until being beaten.

Nobody expected the Jennings juggernaut. The 30-year-old has displayed a quick finger on the buzzer that frequently freezes out his opponents and an impressively broad array of knowledge.

Madonna dedicates 'Imagine' to Russia

Madonna drew massive applause from a sold-out crowd at Paris' Bercy Stadium when she dedicated a cover version of John Lennon's peace ode "Imagine" to the Russian hostage crisis.

Addressing the audience midway through her Sunday night show, Madonna spoke briefly about the hostage-taking at a school in the southern city of Beslan that left at least 330 dead. Officials have blamed the deadly attack on Chechens and other Islamic militants.

Cultural differences bring opportunities for education

"Hey, this is dog food, come over here," my cousin called out loudly two years ago in Kansas City at Wal-Mart.

It was my first day out shopping in the United States. I could not hide my disbelief. Could they sell so many different varieties of dogs and brands for dogs?

Mahalakshmi Ganapathy

I am sorry if I sound offensive to so many pet lovers. I'm from a country where 98 percent of them are stray dogs, while one percent enjoy exotic homes, and the rest are police dogs.

The surprises did not stop with dog food, but continued with dog swimsuits, cat toys, Pet Medicare, pet insurance, pet birthdays and someone having a lizard as a pet.

The cultural differences are enormous when an international student arrives in the United States, because studying here has opened a path to reach so many different ways of living.

In a casual conversation with other international students in my department, I realized there is a similarity amidst the South Asian countries and a marked difference between the American way of life and ours.

Needless to say, all of us came here to experience the American life.

Bumsub Jin, a graduate student from Korea, said the most shocking thing about America is that the act of love-making is shown explicitly on TV. The Korean media is highly conservative—such ideas are merely suggested, and then a cut-away scene is shown. This is no different from Indian media, where "crossing the line" will create agitation among religious fundamental groups.

In this context of religion, I never have visualized Americans visiting church, praying or fighting over God. Before I came over, my understanding of American religious beliefs was mentioning of God only in the expression "Oh My God (sometimes gosh)," which is very casual in Hollywood movies.

I was thoroughly amazed when I learned there are strong believers of certain branches of Christianity and there are those who disagree vehemently with some other branches, not to mention so many variations of religion.

Jatin Srivastava, graduate student from India, said Americans purposefully have tried to be different from the British. He said people drive on the right side, and it is always "keep right" here when it's normally "keep left" in India. When a switch is pushed up in America, it is "on," while it is the other way in India. This is confusing at first and still can be today.

The cultural differences when I came here fascinated me. In the beginning, it was challenging to accept what was going on around me. A perfect example would be my first day as a graduate teaching assistant, when a student put his legs on the desk for comfort, then opened a packet of chips and a pop can.

Slowly I learned to appreciate the system of education in the United States. The informality lends a convenience for the students to enjoy what they are doing.

Even though there are shortcomings in every culture, it is a matter of . for its followers.

Florida faces shortages in storm's wake

By Vickie Chachere
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TAMPA, Fla. — Frances wound up a two-prong assault on Florida that pounded both the central part of the state and the panhandle, leaving storm-weary residents Tuesday with flooding, frayed nerves and shortages of everyday items such as gas, ice and water. At least 14 deaths were blamed on the storm in Florida and Georgia.

About 3 million people were without electricity in Florida, and officials said Tuesday that power wouldn't be fully restored for a week. In Georgia, more than 500,000 homes and businesses were without electricity Tuesday morning, and even the Georgia Emergency Management Agency was running on generators.

The one-time hurricane had weakened to a tropical depression early Tuesday as it moved northward across Georgia at about 10 mph, weather forecasters said.

By midmorning, rain was falling across Georgia and South Carolina, and parts of North Carolina, Alabama, northern Florida, eastern Tennessee and southeastern Kentucky.

Up to a foot of rain fell on parts of Georgia, the National Weather Service said.

In Tampa, police closed about a mile of a busy thoroughfare because of flooding. More than 100 residents of a retirement home were evacuated in wheelchairs as water sloshed against their feet.

"I'm not scared," said Heather Downs, who moved into the home two weeks ago after her apartment was badly damaged by Hurricane Charley. "I've been through a lot."

Panhandle residents withstood the tropical storm's heavy rain and wind of 65 mph that ruined Labor Day weekend.

forced to shuffle different players to try and find the right combination.

Snyder said the changes gave him and the coaches a chance to see what certain players could do and what work remains to be done.

"Yes, it gave us some insight as to who can play where and who the best three are at what positions, and at the same time there was still a hint that we need to practice and find out," he said.

Snyder also said Sims might be available for the game against the Bulldogs, but it wasn't certain as of yet.

With Sims and Simmons out of the lineup, senior Maurice Thurmond, junior Kyle Suttles and sophomore Sean Lowe filled in against the Hilltoppers, recording eight tackles between the three.

WIDE-OUTS STILL COMPETING

Although junior wide receivers Yamon Figs and Davin Dennis clearly showed they were ready to be part of the Wildcat offense, Snyder said the position is still up for grabs.

"I think they have (separated) enough that they need to be with our number ones," Snyder said. "I think it's still competitive, but I wouldn't say they have isolated themselves at any of those positions."

Figs led K-State in receiving against Western Kentucky with five catches for 84 yards, but he said all the receivers need to work hard to overcome the talented and speedy Fresno State defensive backs.

"I just know that we have to go out there and play them hard," Figs said.

attempts, despite being able to hit a 40-yard field goal in the second quarter.

In overtime, LSU scored on its first possession, making the score 22-15. Oregon State then scored on a 19-yard touchdown pass from quarterback Derek Anderson to make it 22-21.

All Serna had to do was kick the extra point to send the game into double overtime; instead the redshirt freshman didn't even come close to the up-rights, giving LSU the win.

Before the extra point, OSU coach Mike Riley tried to call a timeout to think about going for the two-point conversion, but as fate would have it, the officials didn't catch it in time. At least he tried to think about sending his kicker out there.

After his third extra-point miss, Serna tried to bury his head as far into the turf as he could.

Wouldn't you?

I'm sure the pressure of kicking a game-winner is enormous, but that is what kickers are there for — to hit the big field goal and celebrate like its nobody's business. Kickers just need to be careful celebrating, so they don't end up like Bill Gramatica.

So, to all the equipment managers out there, make sure everything is accounted for, and get the padded cell and straight jacket ready for when your kicker misses the big kick.

HIGH SCHOOL | Growth essential in relationships

was during a midterm.

Another problem Barker said she ran into was what Lambert refers to as a "cyclical relationship." The cycle referred to is the on-again, off-again status of the relationship.

"Being in a cyclical relationship is similar to staying together in a bad relationship," Lambert said. "The relationship may be built on negative things."

Barker said her relationship had a negative effect on her life.

"I stopped eating and would start drinking a lot and tended to over-romanticize everything in life," Barker said.

Lambert said these relationships often continue because those in the relationship worry that they will never find anyone else.

"People say, 'If I don't have this relationship, then I'll never have a relationship,'" Lambert said. "Staying in a relationship because it's with the first person you dated or had sex with can be a bad thing. It's often healthy to try different relationships."

Barker said she distanced herself from her boyfriend as the relationship went on, but he became more attached and possessive. She said after they broke up, this pattern continued.

"Afterwards, I was still upset, but I started dating almost immediately," Barker said. "It bothered him a lot. He still wanted to be friends and would call every day. This has only stopped in the last six months."

Lambert said one of the major things couples struggle with is how they spend their time together.

"Constant arguing can go on about how they spend their time," Lambert said. "Couples clash about together and apart time."

Schuler said part of what makes her relationship work is that she and her boyfriend give each other a lot of room.

"We have enough room for our own interests," Schuler said. "We still share them with each other — as long as it gives us a chance to spend time together, it doesn't matter whose interests we're spending time on."

"We've been going out a long time, but we still have a long time to figure out what we want."

Lambert said it is important to give your significant other room to grow, and don't be afraid to end a potentially harmful relationship.

"A destructive relationships create a great toll on relationships as well as the community," Lambert said.

Paper ballots being phased out

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA, Kan. — Paper ballots, still used in about one-fifth of Kansas counties, are on their way out.

Electronic voting machines will have to be ready for use at all 2,200 Kansas polling places by 2006 because of a federal law requiring that the handicapped have a way to vote without any assistance.

"We've got a lot of work to do, quite frankly," said Secretary of State Ron Thornburgh.

Sedgwick County has been using electronic voting machines for the last decade, but about a quarter of the 850 machines will be replaced, making it easier for voters with disabilities to cast ballots.

County Election Commissioner Bill Gale said the new machines likely will be sleeker, smaller, laptop-like units with an audio function.

The federal government will pay for most of the new machines, with the state pitching in 3 percent and counties paying for 2 percent, Thornburgh said.

Gale said Sedgwick County may consider paying to replace all of its aging machines at the same time. But with voting machines selling for about $5,000 each, it's unclear whether that will be possible.

Voting security is among the emerging concerns as the country moves to all-electronic voting. Thornburgh said the state will start researching that this month.

The secretary of state's office is assembling a team, including computer experts and election officials, to develop a request for proposals for new machines. The request to vendors will go out in the spring, Thornburgh said, and the state will consider buying about 1,500 machines.

The state plans to give counties a list of three or four vendors from which to choose.

Thornburgh said one factor in choosing new machines will be how they balance technology and security. The answer might be machines that print a receipt that voters can use for verification.

Voting machines now in use in Kansas are not linked electronically to county election offices. Election workers must deliver voting results in person, which protects against hacking or loss of information due to system failure.

The machine used by Sedgwick County has a roll of paper that tracks votes cast.

"Should something happen to a machine — should it decide to take an early day off on election day — nothing's lost," Mathis said.

Patrons, neighboring businesses respond to closing of Gumby's bar

By Nathan Ryerson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Listening to local music and going out to the bars is a part of the lives of numerous Manhattan residents.

Both of these entertainment options used to be available in one spot in Manhattan. Students could go to Gumby's Pizza and Pub in Aggieville and listen to local artists and have a beer with friends.

Gumby's closed its bar in July and stopped offering live music as well.

Gumby's representatives refused to comment on their business since the closing of the bar and loss of local music. However, neighbors are disappointed.

"I miss it," said Kelli Muraco, assistant manager at Digital Shelf in Aggieville.

"I used to go over to Gumby's and listen to the bands when they would perform."

Muraco said the closing of Gumby's bar and loss of live music hasn't affected Digital Shelf in any way, but she wishes they had not stopped having bands play there.

Greg Layton, senior in management, isn't too concerned that they shut down their bar.

"I understand and have no problem with the fact that they shut down their bar," he said.

"Business is business and if you aren't making any money, you have to do what you have to do."

"However, I think the fact that they aren't supporting local bands anymore is a step backwards for the Manhattan music scene. I want to support local music, but if there isn't anywhere for live acts to perform, my hands are tied."

Students do have other alternatives.

PJ's Restaurant and Pub in Aggieville offers an outlet for the local music scene.

"We have lots of bands who want to play here," said Jamie Tucker, owner of PJ's. "Not only locally, but we have bands from all over who are hearing about Manhattan and wanting to play here on their way through."

Tucker said they are trying to do everything they can to keep the music scene going.

"We are starting a hip-hop acts night on Saturdays to try and get new kinds of music out into the local music scene," Tucker said.

"Since Gumby's stopped their live music, there have been many people wanting an open mic night," Tucker said.

"So we are going to start having open mic nights on Sundays."

Palestinian PM condemns airstrike

By Ibrahim Barzak
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip - Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia condemned an Israeli airstrike that killed 14 Hamas militants in unusually harsh terms Tuesday, warning the attack will invite a tough response from the militant group and saying retaliation will be "justified."

Palestinian officials said Qureia's comments reflected his people's outrage as well as his impatience with the political paralysis within the Palestinian Authority. They said Qureia told Cabinet ministers he was so frustrated he wants to resign.

The Israeli attack, which struck a Hamas training camp in Gaza City shortly after midnight, came a week after Hamas suicide bombers blew up two Israeli buses in the Israeli city of Be'er Sheva, killing 16 people.

But Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said late Tuesday that the attack was not Israeli retaliation.

"The action against Hamas was not revenge for the horrible murder in Be'er Sheva," he told a party gathering in Jerusalem, "rather, part of our continuous war against terrorism which we will not end until terrorism is stopped."

Early Wednesday, about 25 Israeli tanks moved into northern Gaza, an area where militants fire rockets at Israeli towns just outside Gaza. No clashes were reported. Israeli military sources said a limited operation was underway. No gunfire or casualties were reported.

The airstrike was one of the deadliest of dozens Israel has launched since fighting broke out with the Palestinians four years ago. Thousands of Palestinian mourners in Gaza clamored for revenge, and Hamas vowed to avenge the attack.

Qureia, speaking at a Palestinian Cabinet meeting in the West Bank city of Ramallah, said he was outraged.

"No crime goes unpunished," he said. "For sure there will be retaliation, and the retaliation will be justified if it happens."

While Palestinian leaders always criticize Israeli attacks, Qureia's reaction was especially harsh, hinting that he would tolerate a Hamas reprisal. In the past, Qureia has distanced himself from Hamas, which has carried out dozens of suicide bombings.

Qureia's comments appeared to reflect the Palestinian public's anger over the airstrike. But a government minister said Qureia also was frustrated by his general sense of powerlessness.

Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat repeatedly has blocked efforts to reform the corruption-plagued Palestinian Authority, while Sharon refuses to negotiate with the Palestinians.

"We as a Cabinet are not able to do anything," the minister quoted Qureia as saying. "I am going to Arafat. I will tell him we can't work like this," Qureia said, waving a resignation letter in front of them.

Torrential rains kill 143 in China

By Audra Ang
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BEIJING — Floods and landslides triggered by torrential summer rains have killed at least 143 people and left dozens missing in southwestern China, officials and state television reported Tuesday.

Thousands of army and navy personnel and other rescue workers were in Sichuan province helping displaced residents, unloading emergency supplies and guiding those trapped in muddy, swirling waters, the official Xinhua News Agency said.

Authorities put the enormous Three Gorges hydroelectric project on alert as flood crests passed through the swollen Yangtze River and more rains were forecast, Xinhua said.

Every summer, seasonal rains wreak havoc across much of China, especially along the flood-prone Yangtze and Huai rivers, where millions of people have settled.

Xinhua said 89 were killed and 41 were missing in Sichuan, while another 54 fatalities were reported in sprawling Chongqing municipality, upstream from the Three Gorges.

Some 16 people were missing in Chongqing, even as some residents in the area's Kaixian county were being allowed back to their homes, it said.

State-run China Central Television showed footage of people wading through a murky, chest-high deluge, some with children on their shoulders or being towed in plastic washtubs.

Others struggled through rushing water, grabbing onto ropes so that they wouldn't be swept away.

Streets that weren't under water were covered in rubbish and debris; buildings were in shambles. Scores of emergency workers were shown unloading cases of bottled water in a warehouse, while uniformed soldiers guided boats filled with residents to safety.

"The great needs are to ensure there is sufficient shelter and to get food in and to get in necessary medicine," said John Sparrow, regional information director for the Red Cross.

More than 3,000 people left homeless by the flooding were sheltering in schools and government buildings, and rescuers were handing out quilts, medicine, bottled water and instant noodles, Xinhua said.

Medical teams were sent to Kaixian county to help prevent disease outbreaks after 100,000 people there were left without safe drinking water, it said.

Flooding losses were initially estimated at $470 million, Xinhua said, with the greatest damage caused by landslides and flash floods sweeping through mountain valleys.

The central government has allocated about $5 million in relief funds to the region, Xinhua said. Another $600,000 was set aside by the Sichuan government for Dazhou, its hardest-hit town where 46 of the deaths occurred, according to CCTV. In a separate report, Xinhua said rains on Tuesday caused a mudslide that killed one person and left five missing in Lijiang, a town in Yunnan province south of Sichuan.

tax money was a downside, Sampson assured commission members that it would be money well invested, especially with the job opportunities the company can offer.

"Every technology-based job is high value and creates high value. Potential for the city getting more money than it is promised is very, very real," Sampson said.

Sampson estimated at least 200 jobs would be open to citizens of Manhattan.

Commissioners were hesitant to agree to the large expense, but Commissioner Mark Hatesohl did not want to waste the opportunity.

"This is the best thing that has ever shown up on our doorstep. We'd give him the damn farm, if we had it," Hatesohl said.

Other commissioners did not agree, leading the debate late into the night.

"Maybe we are being sticks in the mud, but this has been thrown together very fast," Mayor Brad Everett said. "The wages are great, and the bodies are great. We are still here as residents and want to look the taxpayer and say, 'We did you right.'"

Hatesohl was more willing to take action.

"I think what the voters wanted is for us not to come back asking for more," Hatesohl said.

NISTAC representatives said they would return to the next commission meeting to hammer out the details with members' input.

the war on terrorism. The Sept. 11 Commission, however, concluded that Iraq and al-Qaeda did not have a "collaborative relationship" before the 2001 attacks on New York and Washington, and some have questioned to what extent foreign terror groups are involved in the anti-U.S. insurgency in Iraq.

Fighting between U.S. soldiers and al-Sadr's militiamen erupted Tuesday when U.S. officials said the cleric's gunmen fired on Americans carrying out patrols in the Sadr City district of Baghdad. Two Americans died in the fighting, U.S. officials said.

A senior Iraqi Health Ministry official, Saad al-Amili, said 35 Iraqis were killed and 203 wounded in the Sadr City clashes. An al-Sadr spokesman, Sheikh Raed al-Kadhimi, blamed "intrusive" American patrolling for provoking the fighting.

"Our fighters have no choice but to return fire and to face the U.S. forces and helicopters pounding our houses," al-Kadhimi said in a statement.

Late Tuesday, the militia announced a unilateral cease-fire but said it would fight back in self defense. It was unclear whether the statement had any meaning since the militia routinely defends its actions as legitimate self defense.

U.S. Army Capt. Brian O'Malley said he was unaware of the cease-fire offer but that the area was quiet in the early evening. "We only fire when we are fired at, but we will not stop our patrols or withdraw from our positions," he said.

At the Pentagon, Gen. Richard Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, blamed the spike in U.S. combat deaths on an insurgency that "is becoming more sophisticated in its efforts to destabilize the country."

"We are aggressively seeking and capturing those insurgents who are not willing to do so themselves, but are encouraging people to commit suicide attacks," Myers told reporters Tuesday. "Make no mistake, we will continue to pursue those who seek to disrupt progress in Iraq."

During the Sadr City fighting, U.S. warplanes flew over the sprawling neighborhood — home to some 2 million people. American tanks, their turrets spinning, deployed in key intersections. Ambulances with sirens wailing rushed the wounded to hospitals as plumes of heavy, black smoke rose over the mainly Shiite neighborhood.

U.S. forces appeared to be carrying out most — if not all — of the fighting. No Iraqi security forces were seen during the clashes, though U.S. spokesmen talked of "multinational forces" involved in the operations, a term that sometimes includes Iraqi troops.

Small groups of al-Sadr's al-Mahdi Army fighters pounded on the asphalt with hammers to plant mines and explosives in the streets. Fighters in their teens and early 20s trotted toward the clashes — rocket-propelled grenades in hand — as children scampered behind them.

Other militiamen, rifles in hand, gathered on street corners. Fighters using rocks and tires blocked roads leading to the area. By afternoon, most stores in the neighborhood were shuttered.

Elsewhere, a bomb exploded Tuesday near the convoy of the governor of the Baghdad region, killing two people. Gov. Ali al-Haidri escaped injury, Interior Ministry spokesman Col. Adnan Abdel Rahman said.

In another part of the capital, armed men in olive green uniforms stormed the office of an Italian aid group and seized two Italian women and two Iraqis. It was only the second known kidnapping of foreign women since a wave of hostage-taking began this year. A female Japanese aid worker was captured in Fallujah in April but was released a week later.

Al-Sadr aides said Tuesday's fighting in Sadr City broke out after talks with interim Prime Minister Ayad Allawi's government stalled.

Those talks followed a deal last month to end fighting between U.S. troops and al-Sadr's forces in the southern city of Najaf.

The government had refused al-Sadr's demands to keep American troops out of the Baghdad Shiite neighborhood.

In other developments: ■ The son of the governor of the northern Nineveh province, which includes the city of Mosul, was killed in a drive-by shooting Tuesday, hospital officials said. Lieth Duried Kashmoula was hit by two bullets in the chest.

■ Unknown gunmen killed the deputy director of Baghdad's al-Karim hospital, Abbas al-Husseini, the Health Ministry said. The motive for the attack was not known.

■ Two Iraqi policemen were killed and two others wounded in a drive-by shooting late Monday in Latifiyah, 25 miles south of Baghdad.

■ Insurgents opened fire with automatic weapons on 14 Italian soldiers at a checkpoint by a bridge about four miles north of Nasiriyah, said Col. Carmelo Abisso, spokesman for the Italian contingent in Iraq. The Italians returned fire, and the gunfire lasted about an hour, he said.

HYBRID CARS | Tax break an incentive to buy

he said.

Yunk said he agrees hybrids provide an adequate level of performance.

"The car is not that much different from a conventional vehicle, but you can notice the difference in performance," he said.

Since the car does not use gasoline most of the time, it is much quieter when driving around town, Yunk said.

Schwerdtfeger said sales are competitive now; however, newer models will be hitting showroom floors in a month.

"I always recommend people looking at the benefits of buying a new car as trendy as the hybrid," Schwerdtfeger said. "Sometimes they purchase more on instinct, thinking they are buying something that can really save them big bucks."

He said most people will save money by purchasing a hybrid, but advised customers to weigh the differences before spending as much as $5,000 more on a hybrid.

"There is also a federal tax break for purchasing this type of Hybrid cars such as the Toyota Prius have attracted carbuyers interested in saving money on gasoline, according to some auto sales associates.

car," Schwerdtfeger said.

Yunk said, despite the price difference, the tax break made his purchase economically feasible.

"When I purchased my hybrid, I spent $24,000," Yunk said.

"Yet after the $4,000 state and federal tax incentives, the investment was well worth it."

But the excellent gas mileage was not the only advantage that influenced Yunk to purchase a hybrid, he said.

"Sure, you get a 20 to 30 percent increase of mileage performance, but the hybrid has a 90 percent reduction of fossil fuels,"

Yunk said. "You could have up to 10 hybrids and be producing as much harmful fossil fuels as one conventional vehicle."

"That makes a difference." Schwerdtfeger said he hopes his customers can understand the value of investing in a hybrid vehicle.

"Hybrids typically get 50 to 60 miles per gallon of gasoline, and if you're driving in-town, the car mostly runs on electric power," Schwerdtfeger said. "If gasoline prices stay at where they are today, I expect the hybrid to take over the automotive industry in the next couple years."

Group of suspects strikes local convenience stores

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two aggravated robberies occurred early Wednesday morning at two Shop Quik locations in Manhattan.

Riley County Police Department Captain Gary Grubbs said in a press release that both instances involved suspects described as two black males and two white females.

The first robbery occurred at 4:12 a.m. at 430 Fort Riley Blvd., and the second about 10 minutes later at 529 Richards Road.

At the Fort Riley Boulevard store, the taller male approached the female clerk. He then grabbed her neck and showed a large folding knife, according to the press release.

The suspect took an undetermined amount of money from the cash register after the clerk refused to open the safe.

At the Richards Road store, a female clerk was approached by both male suspects. The taller male suspect showed the folding knife and took an undetermined amount of cash from the register.

All four suspects were last seen driving a green four-door vehicle heading westbound on Fort Riley Boulevard crossing Seth Child Road.

Grubbs said this was a unique robbery, and Manhattan doesn't have many cases of single-instance robberies.

"To say that we don't have any would be incorrect, but the ones that we have are still less than other cities," Grubbs said.

Businesses can do things to help prevent robberies, he said.

"They should educate clerks on exactly what to do if they were robbed and what to be observant for."

Further classroom renovations possible in future

Despite the demolition of Denison Hall during the summer, K-State officials have utilized new locations to make up for the loss of classroom space.

The basement of Kedzie Hall was renovated during the summer and students now attend classes in Kedzie 004.

The K-State Student Union Little Theater and the Ecumenical Campus Ministries building also have been utilized to house courses for the fall semester.

David Jones, ECM pastor, said this is the first semester they have held a regular class for K-State.

"We have held classes here for the UFM and for the Department of Continuing Education before," he said. "When Denison Hall was demolished, I was approached by the K-State administration when they wanted to find out about renting space for regular courses."

Currently one continuing education class and one regular K-State class are being held at the ECM building at 1021 Denison Ave. Jones would not disclose the amount the university pays in rent.

Bruce Shubert, associate vice president for administration and finance, said the class in the ECM building was added because of the loss of Denison.

"We felt we needed additional facilities because of the loss of space," he said. "My role was to be sure we had enough classroom space to conduct business, and we couldn't just get one across town because students couldn't get to it."

Dave DeBusman, project coordinator for facilities planning, said there are other classrooms that are in the works.

"We will be adding another classroom to the basement of Kedzie, and we also have plans to do a classroom in the basement of Willard Hall," he said. "By next fall we might be able to get those done."

The Willard Hall renovation is projected to cost about $150,000, and the Kedzie Hall renovation is projected to cost about $60,000.

The east and west portions of Memorial Stadium also may be renovated, DeBusman said.

"We are hoping for renovations, but that is contingent on legislative approval and the allocating of funding," he said.

Local aid groups work for Florida disaster relief

The Flint Hills Chapter of the American Red Cross assisted with major disaster reliefs in Florida and will be sending representatives to help with hurricane relief.

"We have worked on projects such as the flooding in Republic County to the September 11 attacks," said Jeremy LaFaver, American Red Cross Flint Hills Interim Director. "Today we are working on much larger projects."

The local chapter is working on providing relief for Hurricane Frances and Hurricane Charley victims.

Three of the thirty local volunteers have already been deployed to projects in the relief operation project in Florida.

The Flint Hills Chapter is one of the largest chapters in the nation, LaFaver said.

Women's studies added as a major

By Joanna Rubick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Women's studies at K-State have gone from being offered only as a minor to a secondary major, and now it is a full-fledged major.

More than 10 students have already decided to become a major, Cia Verschelden, director of women's studies, said.

Verschelden said in order for women's studies to become a major they needed to have at least three tenured teachers, which they now have.

"We've been working towards it for 10 years - towards our goal," she said.

Women's studies officially became a major on March 18, she said. The University of Kansas and Wichita State University already have majors in the area.

"We are at sort of the same timing as many other programs," she said. "This is very consistent with the nation."

Negative campaign ads affect voters differently

By Lacey Storer
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Each election year some issues are focused on more than others. Whether it be taxes, health care or the economy, one usually stands in front.

This year the issue standing out is war. But not the war that's happening now — the war that happened 30 years ago.

Swift Boat Veterans for Truth ads feature allegations against John Kerry, claiming he lied about his involvement in the war and questioning the merit of medals he received. The ads are not paid for by the Bush campaign.

Though many political campaigns feature ads attacking the other candidate, these ads have made a more significant impact than others, said several K-State professors.

John Fliter, associate professor of political science, said the ads have taken focus away from other central issues of the election.

"I definitely believe it has distracted from the debate and the issues in the campaign and Bush's record in the past four years," Fliter said. "Instead of the war in Iraq, we're talking about the war in Vietnam."

Joe Aistrup, head of the political science department, said while candidates' backgrounds should be considered, their service records shouldn't be an important factor in an election.

"Any aspect of a candidate's background is part and parcel of who a candidate is," Aistrup said.

"Service records are an issue. All issues, voters should take into account. Should (Kerry's) be an issue voters focus on? Probably not."

Aistrup said some who

"I don't think it's anything new. It's just that this time around he's running for president — the stakes are higher."

John Fliter
ASSOCIATE PROFESSOR POLITICAL SCIENCE

viewed Kerry as a war hero have changed their minds.

"There are a group of people, some veterans, who were persuaded by John Kerry as a war hero, that he would be a good commander in chief," Aistrup said. "It appears that they were swayed by those ads. Kerry has seen a 10-point drop in the polls."

Though Kerry's service record has come under intense scrutiny, President Bush's record hasn't affected his campaign as much.

James Sherow, associate professor of history, said part of the reason for this was that Bush's record hasn't been as available to the public.

"If they're going to make an issue of John Kerry's war record, then George Bush's service record ought to be equally public," said Sherow, who served in the Air Force during the Vietnam War.

Although it just recently came into the public eye, the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth isn't a new group. It has been in existence since the Nixon era.

"They went after a young John Kerry running for Congress. They've been haunting Kerry since he's begun running for office," Aistrup said.

"But in none of his other campaigns have these group been taken seriously."

Fliter said he thought the group is working harder now to discredit Kerry.

"I don't think it's anything new. It's just that this time around he's running for president — the stakes are higher," Fliter said. "They've got more money now."

One of the group's major backers is Bob J. Perry, a Houston-based businessman. Perry, who contributed more than $100,000 to the group, has long been a donor to President Bush and other Republicans from Texas.

Fliter said he didn't understand why the group has gotten so much coverage, based on lack of documentary coverage they have for their claims.

Sherow said he agreed with Fliter, saying that many of the group's claims seem unfounded.

"My opinion about those, based on what I've read, is that they're unwarranted," Sherow said. "I think there are too many pieces of evidence on the Swift Boat side that don't make sense. One supporter has turned on him, but several others have recollections of things that are exactly how reports are."

While Kerry's service may continue to be debated, more voters may be turning their attention to more immediate issues, Fliter said.

"Polls are starting to indicate that people want to get back to real issues," Fliter said. "Most Americans think the real issues are what's going on now: the war and the economy, among other things."

"I just hope this goes away soon, and we can start focusing on issues related to this country."

U.S. launches warplane attacks following Fallujah insurgency

Roadside bomb kills 1, injures 2 in Baghdad

By Hamza Hendawi
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — U.S. warplanes hammered suspected militant strongholds in Fallujah on Wednesday after a suicide bombing there and a series of attacks in Baghdad pushed the number of U.S. military deaths in the Iraq campaign past 1,000.

Sporadic explosions lit the sky throughout the night, and several buildings were razed to the ground. A thick plume of smoke rose from the western city after American jets struck a suspected militant stronghold used to plan attacks on American forces, the military said.

Hospital officials said at least six people were killed and 11 wounded, since the strikes began late Tuesday.

Residents huddled in their homes as planes repeatedly swooped over eastern and southern neighborhoods of Fallujah, a hotbed of Sunni insurgents, witnesses said.

In eastern Baghdad, insurgents detonated a roadside bomb early Wednesday that killed one U.S. soldier and wounded two others. The wounded were evacuated to a combat hospital after the attack.

In other violence Wednesday, gunmen kidnapped the Anbar province's deputy governor Wednesday in the latest assault on officials connected to Iraq's interim government, the Interior Ministry said.

Wednesday's airstrikes targeted a militant "command and control headquarters that has recently been coordinating attacks" against coalition forces, the military said.

Late Tuesday, U.S. jets dropped several bombs and tank and artillery units fired rounds in retaliation for militant attacks on Marines outside the city, said Marine spokesman Lt. Col. T.V. Johnson.

Johnson said in a statement that "significant numbers of enemy fighters (up to 100) are estimated to have been killed" by Tuesday's shelling. The claim could not be verified, and Johnson acknowledged that U.S. forces have not entered the city of Fallujah itself.

The military said it had no information about casualties from Wednesday's strikes.

U.S. forces pulled out of Fallujah after ending a three-week siege in April following the killing of four American contractors. But stiff resistance and political backlash forced the Americans to abandon the siege, and the militants emerged stronger than ever.

Fighting with insurgents killed eight Americans in the Baghdad area on Tuesday and Wednesday, pushing the American death count to 1,004. The tally was compiled by the Associated Press based on Pentagon records and AP reporting from Iraq.

Commenting on the death toll, President Bush said Wednesday "we mourn every loss of life" and declared that the United States was making good progress in the war against terrorism.

"We're still at war," Bush said during a meeting with congressional leaders. "We've got to do everything we can to protect the homeland."

Democratic presidential candidate Sen. John Kerry said the United States joined the friends and relatives of those who died in mourning their loss.

"Today marks a tragic milestone in the war in Iraq. More than one thousand of Americas sons and daughters have made the ultimate sacrifice. Our nation honors their service and joins with their families and loved ones in mourning their loss," Kerry said.

"We must never forget the price they have paid."

Scanning continues after early anti-virus successes

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Operation PC has proven itself successful.

Rebecca Gould, director of the Information Technology Assistance Center, said the preventative measure taken to reduce widespread viruses throughout the residence halls was worth it.

"We figure it has been very helpful considering the low number of computers in residence halls with viruses or mal-ware this semester," she said.

The Operation PC program required students living in residence halls to get updates on their computer before using the network.

Students in the residence halls who wanted to use the ethernet received the most-recent updates for their operating systems and the latest version of the anti-virus program Symantec.

Royce Gilbert, project lead for Operation PC, said the updates were of no charge to the students as the license for the program was paid for by the university.

Raymond Cheung, systems coordinator for Computing and Networking Services, said about 2,700 computers received the required updates.

A scan is done weekly to check for computers on the system that may be vulnerable, Gould said. These computers will then be blocked out to prevent a possible virus from spreading.

Scanning was done daily during the first few weeks of school, but that has changed, Gould said.

"We have changed the scan to be once a week during a non-peak time, so students don't experience a slower internet connection," she said.

Cheung said about 100 students have been listed as vulnerable.

Gould said the initial Operation PC project was very labor intensive.

"There were 75 people working at four different locations on campus," she said.

Cheung said it is possible that the updates may be automated in the future.

"We discussed that, and I think we have some options," he said. "We need to do a team effort with everyone to see which way would be the best."

TO THE POINT Contributions for disaster aid encouraged

Flint Hills Red Cross Chapter is again rushing to the rescue of people in a disaster area.

The chapter is sending volunteers to Florida to assist in disaster relief from Hurricanes Charley and Frances.

The individuals sent to disaster relief are going without restraint. Their ability and need to help people in a disastrous situation goes beyond their personal needs.

Thus far, three of the 30 members of the Flint Hills Chapter have been deployed to serve in Florida – more might be sent.

The cost of sending relief is growing, and there are thousands of people to assist, yet the Red Cross volunteers find the means to do what they can.

Manhattan community members have thoughtfully sent people to help, as well as monetary relief and should continue to do so.

Donations to the Flint Hills Chapter are encouraged and can help send aid to places natural disasters have occurred.

There are other ways to help, volunteers are always welcomed, if not at one organization, another could use the assistance.

Kudos to the Red Cross for helping Florida residents who were left homeless.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

According to Jeff Barnes, assistant director of Parking Services, parking at K-State is actually "better than it has been" in past years.

Better than it has been? Every day it's completely full. How can it possibly get any worse than full?

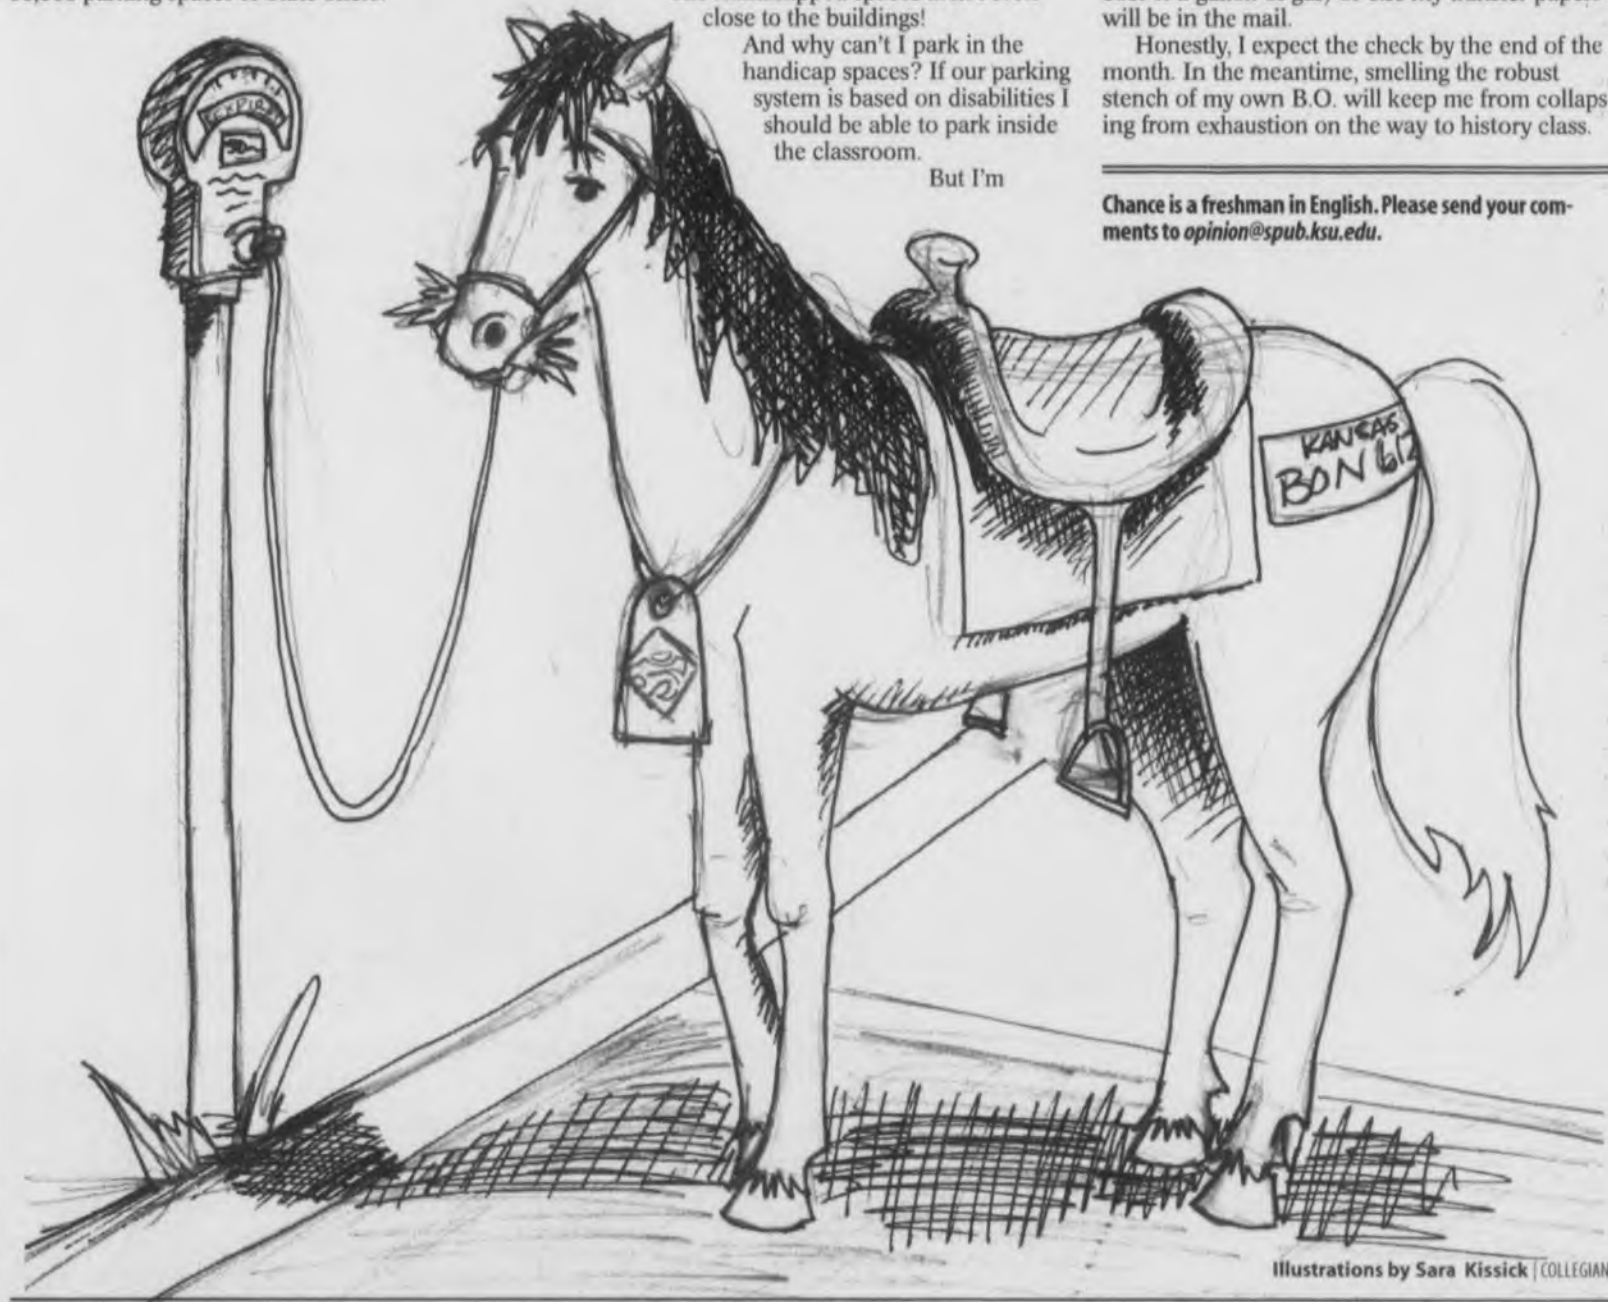

Were they stacking cars on top of each other last year? I don't get it.

Apparently Barnes either rides a horse to work or uses some other means of transportation.

He certainly isn't parking in the same lot I'm parking in, because it's gridlocked practically from sunup to sundown.

Mr. Barnes also mentioned that, at last count, around 13,500 parking permits have been issued to people whose vehicles will fill the roughly 10,000 parking spaces K-State offers.

Scholarship rates need revisions

The university could be alienating its best and brightest.

While tuition has risen steadily for the past four years, many students' scholarships have not.

The Putnam Scholarship, for instance, is termed a full-tuition scholarship. Unfortunately, it covers full tuition for only the first year.

In subsequent years, tuition rates climb while the value of the scholarship remains steady.

A 2001 graduate who received the Putnam scholarship received $1,500 per semester, which was the average cost of tuition for that fall.

However, that student, now a senior, will receive the same $1,500 each semester, but the average cost of tuition and fees is 77 percent higher.

Such scholarships are supposed to be rewards for students who excel academically in high school. The award allows students to focus on academics rather than scraping together money to afford tuition.

It helps, but it is simply not enough.

Maintaining the grade point average to retain a scholarship is not an easy task, and it becomes more difficult if a student has to work long hours to make ends meet.

By not allowing scholarship awards to increase with tuition rates – especially when the tuition hikes were planned in advance – the university opens the possibility of cheating students out of scholarships altogether.

Officials at the KSU Foundation and in the Office of Student Financial Assistance should work together to ensure students are awarded a proportional amount of tuition each year.

Employees receive cost-of-living raises – why should scholarship awards be different?

The university should work to equalize the meaning of a scholarship and not penalize students for accepting scholarships earlier.

The relative value of a student's award should not decrease over time.

This is not just a policy to consider for scholarships, though.

Last week, the Collegian ran a story about Student Governing Association's review of compensation for student officials. Should top SGA officials receive more compensation than they're receiving?

Absolutely.

It is heresy to expect students to work just as hard, for the same reward, while being forced to pay higher fees. When you consider inflation in the general economy and factor in higher-than-average tuition increases, it's a wonder students have been able to do so much with so little.

A 2004 graduate who received the Putnam scholarship receives $4,500, which is about the average cost of 14 hours of tuition and fees.

A 2001 graduate who received the Putnam scholarship deserves the same amount.

But where does the money come from? Anywhere.

These students are the lifeblood of K-State academics. Find the money somewhere.

Raise the standards and award 10 fewer scholarships next year. Ask the athletic department to donate to the academic scholarship fund. Equalize the existing budget between new and existing scholars.

Just find the money. These students deserve it.
